PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 12, 1917.

(Legislative day of Friday, May 11, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. JONES of Washington and Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	James	Myers	Sheppard

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish again to announce that the Finance Committee is engaged in public hearings on the revenue bill, and I ask leave of absence for the members of the committee for to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the members of the Finance Committee are excused.

THE COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

Mr. THOMPSON. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably with an amendment Senate resolution 59, submitted by the chairman of the Finance Committee. It is a matter of some importance, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield for that purpose.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was, in line 4, after the word "clerk," to insert "for not to exceed 60 days," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized, during the Sixty-fifth Congress, to administer oaths; to employ a temporary clerk for not to exceed 60 days, at $4 per diem, and a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

THE PANAMA CANAL (S. DOC. NO. 29).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War submitting an urgent estimate of appropriation in the sum of $428,900 for extraordinary expenses heretofore and hereafter incurred by the Panama Canal in protecting the canal and canal structure, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL QUARTERS FOR NAVY DEPARTMENT (S. DOC. NO. 28).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Navy submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $75,000 for rent of additional quarters for the use of the Navy Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, informed the Senate that the House of Representatives has recommitted to the committee of conference the report of the committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3545) entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 1006. An act authorizing the county of Morrison, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in said county; and

S. 1007. An act authorizng the city of Bemidji, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near that place.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to withdraw the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, which I submitted a few days ago, in view of the fact that the House has recommitted the report to the committee of conference, and let the bill go back to conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the conference report is withdrawn.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CALAIS, ME., May 10, 1917.

To WOODROW WILSON,
President of the United States of America:

The Congregational Conference and Missionary Society of Maine, in annual session at Calais, hereby pledges to the President of the United States the loyalty of Maine Congregationalists in the fight for freedom.

Deploring with you the need of strife, we yet accord our hearty indorsement to the inspired sentiments so nobly voiced in your memorable utterance upon the world war.

Eminently worthy of our Pilgrim heritage, they touch the highest ideals of altruistic Christian service, and we can do no less than pledge our "last full measure of devotion" "to make democracy safe upon the earth" and to win the fight against ruthless autocracy. To this end we cordially approve the principles of selective draft and universal service.

II.

We beg you to declare at once for absolute national prohibition during the war. First, thus to secure the sobriety and increase the efficiency of our manhood during the present stress; second, as an effective means of conserving our food supply.

III.

As the struggle has now become world-wide, we beg you to command the strongest men of our land as advisors, and as soon as in your judgment it may seem wise to accept the offer of our distinguished citizen, Col. Theodore Roosevelt, and his fellow patriots, to enter the fields of France, in payment of an age-long debt and as a signal contribution to the cause of human freedom and human rights.

W. G. MALLETT, President.
GEO. E. KINNEY, Clerk.

Mr. SUTHERLAND presented a telegram embodying resolutions adopted by the Rotary Club, of Wheeling, W. Va., favoring the adoption of the so-called Roosevelt amendment to the Army bill to raise a volunteer force for service in France, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE.

Mr. GORE. From the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 2263) to provide further for the national security and defense, to conserve foods, feeds, and fuels, and to prevent monopolies, conspiracies, and other evil practices respecting the same, and for other purposes. I desire to state that I shall submit a report (No. 37) to accompany the bill at a later day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. GORE, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 53) authorizing the President to appoint two additional Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 40) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following joint resolutions, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. J. Res. 39. A joint resolution to appropriate $3,000,000 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to prosecute the work of eradicating the southern cattle tick (Rept. No. 38); and

S. J. Res. 40. A joint resolution to appropriate $500,000 for the encouragement of the production of foodstuffs (Rept. No. 39).

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 291) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to strike out subsection (c) as amended.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the amendment which was adopted yesterday is one which in substance was prepared and presented by myself. It was presented at a time when the Senate had refused to strike out subsection (c). It was presented in the hope that the rigors of the bill as reported by the committee might be in some measure mitigated.

I am very glad that the amendment was adopted, because if any legislation upon this subject is to be had it is gratifying to know that the restrictions upon speech and publications are such that the rules and regulations must be confined to military operations.

But, Mr. President, I am opposed to any legislation on the subject at this time. I have been opposed to it from the beginning. When the bill was reported and under consideration in the Senate during the last session of Congress I happened to be one of a very few Senators who urged the reasons which have since been amplified against legislation of this character. When we were considering the Senate bill some days ago, which had the same language, I gave my reasons somewhat fully both from the standpoint of the Constitution and the standpoint of policy with regard to legislation of this character wholly apart from the constitutional aspect of the matter, and I have not a word to say in addition to the argument I have already made upon that subject. I regard it as extremely unwise and entirely unnecessary to adopt legislation of this kind at this time.

I believe profoundly that it will do vastly more harm than good. I recognize that there are instances which ought to be controlled by restrictive rules or regulations, but there are so many more instances when it would be injurious to the public welfare to enforce such legislation that I am impelled to say, as I have often before said, that the cause we are now fighting for, the war we are now prosecuting will be more successfully carried to a triumphant conclusion without legislation of this character than with it.

I intend to vote heartily for the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. I felt that I ought to say so much in order that any seeming inconsistency between my position upon the amendment I prepared, but which was offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and the vote that I now cast may be fully understood.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the pending motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending motion is that of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to strike out the amended subsection (c).

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, my recollection is that I voted for this bill when it passed the Senate at the last session, before this called session. With a good deal of doubt, if I had been called on to vote on yesterday, and with a great deal of hesitation I would have voted for the substitute that we placed in the bill known as the Cummins substitute.

Last night I gave my most earnest consideration to the question, and I do not believe it is necessary to embody any provision of censorship just at this time. Later on we may find it necessary. I do not mean that I would not vote for a provision later on; but I do not see sufficient danger to require it now. I believe it is wiser at this time to permit the fullest and freest of publication than to risk the possible harm which might come from restriction.

There will necessarily be many blunders made by those upon whom we place responsibility in the large and, to a great extent, new work in which they are engaged. I believe that the calling of public attention to what is being done, the fullest publicity about it, is calculated to correct errors and to add to the effort to avoid them, and that benefits may come from such a line of publication.

I see it is suggested that pressure is to be brought at once to send our boys across the water. I have no idea that any considerable number could be properly prepared to go in 12 months, and the freest publication with reference to their want of preparation and the time which should be required to fit them might be considered beneficial to the enemy, but I would rather see the publications made than to see a blunder upon any such line followed.

So, Mr. President, my conclusion, with a great deal of hesitation, with the most earnest effort to find out what is my real duty, is that I should vote against any provision for censorship at the present time.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am very much in the same frame of mind as the Senator from Georgia, who has just spoken. I recognize the fact that reckless and conscienceless men may, through an abuse of the privileges of the press, work very great injury to our country in time of war; that there are many things necessary to the conduct of war which must be carried on in secrecy; and that there are newspaper men in this country so base that they might print matter of that kind when inimical to the public welfare. So, too, there are individuals in our land who do not run newspapers who might be guilty of similar base conduct. I fully appreciate that there are evils of the character referred to against which all of us naturally desire to guard the country. But I also recognize two facts: First, that there is very much truth in the statement which was made on the floor yesterday that any information of the character to which I have been referring is very likely to have reached the agencies of the enemy as soon as it can be reached by the newspaper men of our country; that anything that lies so near the surface that the newspaper reporter can pick it up, will also lie so near the surface that it may be discerned by those agencies which undoubtedly are employed in our country for the purpose of gaining information for the benefit of the enemy.

The second proposition is that the real method of guarding must be calculated to prevent the information leaving the shores of this country. To do this we must gain control of all means of communication beyond the borders of our land. The telephone, the telegraph, and all such instrumentalities must be controlled. It is not the information that is existent within the borders of our own country that is dangerous; it is the information that gets to the enemy which is dangerous.

Realizing these two propositions I also realize the weight of a third, which is that against whatever advantages may come through the control of the press and the suppression of information which ought not to be given out, there is the grave danger of suppressing information that should be given out.

Mr. President, I have examined the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], of which the Senator from Iowa states he was the author, or that he was the author of a similar amendment. I can take that amendment and write one rule under it which, in my own opinion, will set up a censorship in the land. I can write a rule which will provide that "no mention whatsoever shall be made of the 'numbers, description, or disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States or of the plans of naval or military operations' until and unless the article shall have been submitted to the censor located in the city of Washington"; and that sort of rule would be absolutely within the law, and it would absolutely make a censor supreme. If we could have a censor who was not only supreme, but who was at the same time infallible in his judgment and possessed of that fairness of mind which always made him render a decision that was indubitably just, the difficulty would not be so great; but whoever is censor will be a human being; he will be merely one man, with the limitations of one man. He may be a very superior sort of man; he may be a very good man, or he may be a very bad or foolish man; but he will be only one man. Mr. President, I can not give my consent to the setting up in this Republic at this time of any such power.

I have this further to say: We need not make the mistake of thinking that we must do in America everything that has been done in Europe. They find the enemy at their gates. He is 3,000 miles from our shores. They find means of communication so close and so intimate that every sort of precaution must be taken, and yet the same kind of precaution may not be necessary here. They find, with their crowded population, with the enemy surrounding them, and within a days march of their capitals, that it is necessary for them to do many things which it is not necessary for us to do, and which have not been done in those parts of the world at war that lie remote from the scene of conflict. I do not think you will find in Australia, which is thoroughly loyal to the British Government, that the Australians have done all of those things which have been found necessary in Germany or which have been found necessary in France. They take into consideration the vast stretch of miles between the scene of conflict and their homes. We do not need to lose our heads or to grow excited.

Somehow or other I believe that the press of this country will be loyal; somehow or other I believe that our press will give their columns and the brain and the ability of their writers for the purpose of aiding the Government in this great struggle; and until they have proven otherwise, I am not willing to undertake to break down our traditions, our laws, our customs, even possibly our constitutional guaranties. For the present, I am willing to abide existing conditions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to strike out all of section 2 of chapter 2, after the word "years," in line 5, page 37, as amended.

Mr. OVERMAN and Mr. VARDAMAN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], who, I understand, is compelled to be absent from the city to-day. I understand, however, that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote. I therefore feel at liberty to vote and vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] and his pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I also desire to state that if my colleague were present he would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

I desire further to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness. I will ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] is necessarily absent, and that the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] is detained on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the pair of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. PITTMAN. I desire to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. LANE] on account of illness. I fear his illness is so severe that he will not be able to return for some days. I ask that this announcement may stand of record until he is able to appear and answer for himself.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I desire to announce that if present the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] would vote "yea."

Mr. FERNALD. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] to the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and will allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 38, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. JOHNSON of California, to strike out subdivision (c) of section 2, Chapter II, as amended, was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask the Secretary to read the amendment which I submitted yesterday and had printed. It is an amendment to Chapter XII.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In Chapter XII, the last chapter in the bill, it is proposed to insert a new section, to be known as section 5, as follows:

Whenever the Postmaster General shall exclude from the mails any of the matter or things enumerated in sections 2 and 3, Chapter XII, of this act, it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, company, or corporation engaged in the transmission of telegraphic messages by wireless or otherwise to receive, transmit, or deliver any such communication, or the substance of any such communication, or the information contained in such forbidden matter or thing. Any person convicted of violating the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, and in the case of a natural person, by imprisonment not exceeding five years.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will merely say that I have no disposition to discuss this amendment. If Chapter XII is desirable in itself, then this amendment is desirable. It rests on the same principle and seeks to accomplish the same object. It seems to me that it might be even more necessary to interdict certain communications by wireless than through the post office. It has occurred to me, however, that it ought at least to go to the committee of conference. For that reason I have offered it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the amendment goes to conference, I expect to stand by it. I do not want it to go to conference and then be expected to give it up right away. I am not that sort of a conferee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I had not expected the amendment to be treated in such a summary way when I sent it to the desk. I thought the committee could consider it in connection with the other provisions of the bill, and if it should be necessary for the accomplishment of the objects of Chapter XII, it could be accepted. It seems to me that it is necessary. You exclude certain matters from the mail, but permit the same information to be transmitted by telegraphic communication. The wireless can send it to other countries. It seems to me we ought to have control of wireless stations transmitting treasonable matter or undesirable matter to foreign lands.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be stated again. There was considerable confusion in the Chamber when it was read, and I was not able to understand it fully.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma to the fact that section 3 of Chapter XII is not in the bill at all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, there is no provision in the bill upon which to rest any such authority as is proposed to be invested in the Postmaster General by this amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. None whatever.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That has all been stricken out of the bill.

Mr. GORE. I was not aware of that. I withdraw the amendment, then.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and call the attention of the chairman of the committee especially to it. I think he will perhaps accept it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert a new section, to be known as section 4, as follows:

Whenever the present war shall cease by the conclusion of peace between the United States and its enemies in the present war, the President shall so declare by a public proclamation to that effect, and from and after the date of said proclamation the provisions of this act shall cease to be of force and effect.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I desire to call up the amendment offered by me the other day, to follow subsection (b) in section 2 of Chapter II. It relates to the establishment of a press censorship. I will read the amendment proposed:

A press censorship is hereby established, for the period of the war, with the Secretaries of the Navy and War as directors thereof. They or either of them, by written order, may summarily suspend for 30 days any newspaper or magazine making publication of any information concerning the plans or conduct of any military or naval operations or movement of ships or troops, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for fortification or defense, or any other information relating to the public defense which might be useful to the enemy, unless the matter has been given out for publication by one or the other of said directors, or its publication consented to. It shall also be unlawful for the owner or publisher of any newspaper or magazine to make the publications aforesaid or to fail to obey the said order of suspension, and upon conviction of either of said offenses in any court of competent jurisdiction the managing editor thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 and the publication suspended for a further period of six months as part of the judgment against the offender.

That is offered, Mr. President, as following subdivision (b) of section 2 of the chapter we have been discussing. It avoids the objection that was raised by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to the provisions of the bill as originally drawn. This is definite and specific. This does not leave to regulation by anyone the definition of what the offense shall be. The Congress itself declares that it shall be unlawful to publish information about the movement of troops, the movement of ships, or the progress of any works of defense; and those are the only matters about which the press is proposed to be limited or restricted in the publication of.

Mr. President, all of us recognize that the press is the most powerful agency in the Government. All of us recognize that it is the most irresponsible, and it can be the most dangerous. There ought not to be any objection by the press to this much regulation. They say, "We are strong; we are powerful; we are patriotic; we ought to be trusted. We can be trusted to do this thing." Yet the press was insistent that at the beginning of this war we should adopt conscription, and, more than any other force in the United States of America, it compelled the adoption of conscription by this Congress in the beginning of a war.

Now, Mr. President, I say that the press can be trusted. The press can be trusted to do certain things. It can be trusted to tear away the mask of hypocrisy, when it does not conflict with its interests to do so. It can be trusted to uncloak incompetency and inefficiency and let it stand forth naked in hideous ugliness and deformity, but never when it is contrary to its interest to do so.

They ought not to be allowed to publish the movement of troops, to publish the movement of ships, or to publish information regarding the works of defense when it might result to our injury. This is definite, plain, and specific. They know what they are allowed and they know what they are not allowed to publish, and they may even publish this by the consent of the directors. I believe this ought to be done and at this time. All admit that a press censorship may become necessary a little later on. Nobody can be injured, and the Government might be protected in some of its important movements; and I insist that this amendment ought to be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. I should like to have the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I wish to make the same announcement that I made upon the last roll call and vote "nay." I want to ask now that that announcement may stand for the balance of the day.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent from the Senate on official business.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the negative). I see that my pair is not in the Chamber. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and will let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 5, nays 65, as follows:

YEAS—5.

So Mr. KIRBY's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. I propose to add a new chapter by the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new chapter and section, as follows:

CHAPTER XIII.

SECTION 1. On and after September 1, 1917, and during the period of the war with the Imperial Government of Germany, and for one year thereafter it shall be unlawful to use or employ, directly or indirectly, any cereal, grain, or other edible thing in the production of intoxicating liquor in any form or of any kind: Provided, however, That this section shall not be construed to make unlawful the manufacture of alcohol for mechanical, medicinal, or scientific purposes under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. A violation of this section shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or imprisonment of not more than three years, or both.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I recognize that within the limitation of the unanimous-consent agreement it will be impossible to discuss this subject as fully as its importance demands.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask the Senator if he will not agree to omit from his amendment the words "or other edible thing," because alcohol is a product in the manufacture of wine and in the manufacture of cider and other fruit juices. Many of these would otherwise spoil. It seems to me that it would add a great deal of strength and possibly get a good many more votes for the amendment if the Senator confined it entirely to cereals.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will consider that a little later. I have no great objection to that change, although, Mr. President, I should be very glad to see the amendment adopted just as it is. I believe in national prohibition. I would, if I could, prevent the manufacture of intoxicating liquor in time of peace as well as in time of war. I would, if I could, prevent the consumption of intoxicating liquor at all times and under all circumstances; but, Mr. President, I would not have presented this amendment simply in the cause of prohibition. I think we ought to pay some regard to the proprieties of legislation, and therefore the first question that one needs to ask himself here is whether the present bill is an appropriate place for such legislation. I answer that by saying that it is a compound of 12 independent chapters, which have no relation to each other whatever, and which are supposed to cover subjects which need legislation in view of the existing war. I have reached the conclusion therefore that this bill is an appropriate place to consider matters of this sort.

The second inquiry is this: Does the situation demand legislation of this kind during the existing war? Mr. President, within one year of this time, if we may believe those who have the most comprehensive information upon the subject, the people of this country taken together with the people of the countries with which we are in alliance will be starving. They may have barely enough to sustain life, but they will not have enough to sustain the strength which will make them a vigorous and efficient fighting force. The situation, Mr. President, is that we will either have to do without booze or will have to do without bread; one or the other of these things we must get along without. So far as I am concerned, I prefer that the people of this country and our allies in Europe shall have enough to eat before they have recourse to drink. I believe it is more necessary that we shall have food than whisky. I believe it is more necessary that we shall have bread than either beer or wine. I think it is in the highest degree patriotic, and I believe it is absolutely essential that we conserve every pound of foodstuffs in whatever form it may be found.

Now, let us see. For the year ending June 30, 1916, in the production of distilled spirits we consumed 32,000,000 bushels of corn; we consumed 3,000,000 bushels of rye; and 4,480,000 bushels of malt. I will pass over barley and oats and other materials because I shall ask to offer and have printed the table that I have in my hand. We consumed in the manufacture 152,142,232 gallons of molasses, one of the most necessary and sustaining elements in all the category of foodstuffs.

Passing over other statistics which I can not read, I present just this startling fact, that in the production of fermented liquor we used last year 3,390,399,219 pounds of foodstuffs. Taking it all together, we used last year in the production of distilled liquor and fermented liquor more than 7,000,000,000 pounds of various kinds of foodstuffs; and we need them all.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us who is the author of those figures?

Mr. CUMMINS. This is published over the signatures of T. N. Carver, Edmund E. Day, William Z. Ripley, Edwin T. Gay, and Irving Fisher. The first four persons are professors in the department of economics of Harvard University and the last named is professor of political economy in Yale University. I think, therefore, the information I have given is fairly well authentic.

Mr. REED. I do not want to take the Senator's time, but I would like to inquire whether he has had these figures verified by any department of the Government?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not, although they seem to come directly from two departments of the Government.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. My time will be exhausted in a few minutes, and I want to read the certificate of Percy G. Stiles, assistant professor of physiology in Harvard University:

We have reviewed the statistics submitted in regard to the 7,000,000,000 pounds of foodstuffs used in the manufacture of malt and distilled liquors in the United States. It is probable that as much as one-sixth of the total may be necessary for the production of denatured alcohol. At a low estimate of its calorific or fuel value, the remaining five-sixths would supply the energy requirement of 7,000,000 men for a year.

One further suggestion, and my time will be consumed. One of the objections is that we will lose some revenue. Certainly we will, Mr. President, if this provision is adopted, but as between revenue and necessary foodstuffs there can be but one choice. If we had enough foodstuffs to use in making intoxicating liquor there might be some argument in the revenue matter, although there would not be to me; but as between revenues and the things that will sustain life during this mighty war we ought not to hesitate for a single moment.

Now, in answer to the question of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], I recognize that there may be edible things which could be used without serious invasion of the principle I have invoked.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I have no time to enter into the question now.

The table referred to is as follows:

NOTED ECONOMISTS AND FOOD EXPERTS CALL ATTENTION TO THE FOODSTUFFS USED IN LIQUOR.

According to the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the year ended June 30, 1916 (p. 138), there were used during that year for the production of distilled spirits in the United States the following materials:

Corn	bushels	32,069,542
Rye	do	3,116,612
Malt	do	4,480,588
Wheat	do	3,373
Barley	do	148
Oats	do	9,807
Other materials	do	68,822
Molasses	gallons	152,142,232

Omitting wheat, oats, barley, and "other materials," and reducing corn, rye, malt, and molasses to pounds, we get a total of 3,603,911,916 pounds of grain and molasses.

The census for 1900, volume 9, page 602, gives the following figures as to materials used in the manufacture of fermented liquors:

Corn	pounds	483,998,984
Malt	bushels	36,385,365
This amounts to a total of	pounds	2,260,266,146

These seem to be the latest positive figures available. The materials used in 1916 may be estimated as follows, though there is a possible margin of error. The production of fermented liquors for the year 1900 was 38,664,584 barrels. By 1916 it had risen to 58,633,624 barrels (see Report of Commissioner of Internal Revenue for 1916, p. 145). The production increased 51.6 per cent. Assuming an increase of at least 50 per cent in the materials used, we get 3,390,399,219 pounds.

Combining the figures for the manufacture of fermented liquors and distilled spirits, we get a total of 6,994,311,135 pounds of grain and molasses.

This omits all minor ingredients and says nothing about the fruit and glucose used in the production of various other alcoholic beverages.

In a time of food shortage, when conservation of foodstuffs is an important public question, the 7,000,000,000 pounds of food materials which are used in these industries form an item which is worth considering.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am very earnestly in favor of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Iowa, modified or unmodified. This is a matter of the greatest possible consequence to the people of the United States at the present time.

I turn to Senate Document No. 11 of the present Congress, and I find in a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture these words:

Some of the European nations have secured a considerable addition to the food supply either by reducing the production of malt liquors or by reducing or prohibiting the production of distilled liquors. It has been roughly estimated that the value of food materials entering into the manufacture of alcoholic beverages in this country in one year, on the basis of prices lower than those now prevailing, is approximately $145,000,000.

That, Mr. President, comes over the signature of the Secretary of Agriculture, and I assume that that official made a very careful inquiry into the matter. He tells the country, he tells the Congress of the United States, that the material used in the manufacture of liquors in this country in a single year amounts to $145,000,000.

The Senator from Iowa has called attention to the document signed by noted economists, in which they give the startling facts that 7,000,000,000 pounds of food materials are used in these industries every year.

Mr. President, if it be true that there is danger of a shortage of food in this country, a danger of a shortage of food supply of our allies, who are fighting the battles in Europe, it seems to me it is nothing short of a crime for the United States to sit idly by and allow this enormous consumption of food material in the manufacture of liquor, which is disastrous to the people of the United States rather than beneficial to them.

I trust, Mr. President, that this amendment may be agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa offered this amendment in the committee. The members of the Committee on the Judiciary were favorable to this kind of legislation, but after considering the matter thoroughly the committee thought it was not proper to put it on this bill. There is a similar amendment now pending in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on an agricultural bill—a food-conservation bill that is now pending—and the proper place for this amendment is on that bill.

The committee were against it on this bill. I do not know how the committee stand to-day. Because they change their minds so often since this bill has been reported by them to the Senate I do not know how they stand to-day. As far as I am concerned, I do not think the amendment ought to go on this bill.

Ordinarily I would favor the provisions of the amendment. I have always felt that way. The Agricultural Committee has been having hearings. The hearings are going on now in this matter, and I do not think the amendment ought to go on this bill. I favor it, but I do not think that the Senate will put it on this war measure, but wait until we have a report from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, who will report it in a few days, and I learn we will have all the information on this subject. Now, we have only 10 minutes' debate on this question, and I think the Senate ought to be in the possession of all the facts before it votes on it. If you stop making rum out of molasses I do not know what will become of our tobacco people. They have to use rum in the manufacture of tobacco. All those things ought to be considered. I should like to know the facts about it before I vote for it, although generally I am in favor of such legislation.

Let us wait until the Agricultural bill comes here with the report of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and with its testimony printed on this subject. Then we can act with the light before us, and do whatever is best in this matter. Now we would act hastily if we put it on this bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am very heartily in favor of this amendment, and I think it should be placed upon the pending bill. The bill is made up of 10 or 12 separate and distinct measures, and there should be no objection to adding another provision.

This is an important amendment. It will save millions of bushels of grain, to be used in the making of bread and other food products, now used, as the Senator from Iowa said, in the making of liquor, and our people need the bread. They are entitled to have the wheat, the barley, the rye, and the corn now used in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors saved for food purposes.

Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, which I think the Senator from Iowa will accept. After the word "medicinal" I want to add the word "sacramental." I think that word should be added in the Senator's amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to that. I do not believe it ought to be used for sacramental purposes, but it is so slight a matter that I have no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment is accepted and agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, in confirmation of what the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has said, permit me to say it is true that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry are holding hearings on this question and collateral questions at this time, and according to my understanding will be able to conclude its work in a few days. We have had some exceedingly interesting testimony on absolute prohibition or the control to a greater or less degree of the traffic in alcoholic beverages in European countries.

I think I ought to call the attention of the Senate, if this amendment passes in its present form, to the fact that practically all the vineyards now existing in the United States will be destroyed. It prohibits the use of any edible thing in the manufacture of alcoholic beverages.

Mr. President, of course we would attain a higher degree of efficiency if we should reduce and control and perhaps in some direction abolish the use of alcoholic beverages entirely; but it is a pretty big project which this amendment has in contemplation. It starts out by destroying great industries at the very ouset of the war instead of by graduated methods controlling them and reducing the evils which may spring from them and in the light of experience perhaps abolishing those evils entirely.

But the amendment makes no distinction between the harmful and the harmless. It simply says flatly that no food product shall be used in the manufacture of any alcoholic beverage. That, of course, includes wine and reaches grapes and would utterly destroy the business of every farmer, and there are hundreds and hundreds of them, yes thousands, who have all they own invested in vineyards, beautifully cultivated, highly developed. They are perfectly decent people. They are not sinning against society in any way whatsoever when they cultivate their vines, and they are doing no injury to anybody. This amendment will absolutely bankrupt them, for they can not market their grapes if it is passed.

One might continue the same argument and point out the same condition of affairs with respect to other fruits, such as apples and peaches.

I think myself that we ought to give this matter a good deal of careful consideration before we take this jump. No other nation in this war, and the war is now nearly three years old, has attempted any such thing as this.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the Senator support the amendment if the words "any edible thing" are stricken out, so that it would not include grapes and fruits?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I can not say that I would support it if those words were taken out. I point to that particular phase of it as the most drastic one in its effect. To be perfectly frank, I want more light on this very difficult question. If I had my way, and perhaps I shall never have it in this respect, I would eventually bring this country to a condition, under statute if necessary, where hard liquors could not be manufactured or sold, but I have not yet reached the point where I would forbid the manufacture of wines and beers.

I should like to have the chance as a member of the Committee on Agriculture and as a Member of the Senate to understand more about this matter and just what its real effect will be during this war.

Mr. NELSON. I am in hopes that some of the friends of the Constitution will discuss this question from a constitutional standpoint as to our power to enact the legislation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not feel competent to do that at this time, and certainly I have not the time in which to do it now.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield for a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is the Senator from New York familiar with what is going on now in England in regard to this subject?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am familiar with it so far as the testimony which has been given to the Agriculture Committee has thrown light upon it. I beg to say in reply to the question that England has not attempted anything like this. She has controlled the amount of grain that is used in the manufacture of alcoholic beverages and has gradually, step by step, reduced it; but she has not yet reached the point, and the testimony is most clear upon it, where she is ready to say to her workingmen, "You shall not have a glass of beer."

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not referring to the action that has been taken by England, but to the demands that are now being made—the agitation now going on.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Undoubtedly agitation has gone on.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from New York will observe that the amendment is limited to the period of the war and one year thereafter. The vineyards would not be destroyed. They would simply be suspended during that time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, Mr. President, what would the owner of a vineyard do? What would he live on during this interval? He could not live on air.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I know the Senator from New York can not speak for the Agricultural Committee, but I should like to ask him whether or not he is reasonably certain that there will be a report of some nature from the Agricultural Committee of a bill which will give the Senate an opportunity to consider this question later on at this session?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can only express my personal opinion.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is what I am asking for.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My own judgment is that they will. Personally, I think that legislation on this subject is necessary, and I hope it will be had; but I think we should proceed in reason and with the greatest care, otherwise we shall do more harm than good.

Mr. REED. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. REED. The Agricultural Committee is going to report an agricultural bill to the Senate in any event, is it not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, Mr. President, it is my judgment that the Committee on Agriculture will report a bill to the Senate having to do with the conservation of the food supply generally, and somewhat in detail. This matter is distinctly germane to it, and is under discussion.

Mr. REED. And could be offered upon the floor if you bring the subject matter in?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Absolutely; when discussion will be open upon the entire subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from New York if he is not of the opinion that that bill, if it ever comes before the Senate, will lead to a very long and somewhat acrimonious debate? It is a very drastic measure, as I understand it. I do not know what the committee will do with it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from New Hampshire is referring to the food-conservation bill, which was introduced in the other House, and I think perhaps a duplicate of which was introduced in the Senate?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; a duplicate was introduced in the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know in what form the bill will be passed so far as it relates to granting the power to the Government of fixing the prices on all food, articles of clothing, and minerals; but this particular topic will be under discussion at that time, and undoubtedly, sooner or later in this session, it will be brought up for legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. But if the bill does not pass, as some of us hope it never will, this amendment will not become a law.

Mr. KENYON and Mr. PHELAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I rose to make a suggestion to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] in their time. I have the floor now and presume had better hold it.

In reply to the question of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], I will say that the Committee on Agriculture is considering to-day, practically at this time, a bill which was introduced on yesterday by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] bearing on one phase of the food situation, but not particularly on the phase of the conservation of food. It is rather directed to the speculation that is now going on. That committee hopes to report the bill this afternoon and to urge its consideration.

The other phase of conservation, the one which is embraced in the Lever bill, which was introduced in the other House, which has also been introduced here, and which is now before the committee, is so full of troublesome questions that it will be a very long time, I think, before the bill is presented to the Senate by the committee.

The Senator from North Dakota has a bill referring distinctly to this question, which is also before the committee, and on which hearings have been had.

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. REED. I ask if it is not a fact that hearings have been had with reference to the amount of grain which is actually consumed and with reference to the disposition that is made of what is left of grain after it has been used to manufacture liquor, and so forth?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. REED. The committee has gone into that?

Mr. KENYON. That question is before the committee, and the hearings are concluded. I want to say as to that, as everybody knows, that if the bill of the Senator from North Dakota comes out and stands by itself, it will be very difficult to secure action on it at this session. So, notwithstanding the fact that I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture and a member of the subcommittee which is considering the bill of the Senator from North Dakota, I feel that if the result which we desire to accomplish can be accomplished now we ought to do it. It will save time and make it certain. I would advocate it also, of course, as a prohibition measure, because I am one of those who believe in national prohibition, either in peace or war. I think national prohibition is properly a war measure; but the other ground upon which it is advocated, which it seems to me no one can have a legitimate argument against, is the food-conservation proposition.

Mr. President, we might as well wake up, as a Congress, to the fact that, if we are to believe the testimony which has been introduced before the Committee on Agriculture, the food question in this country will become a serious one. I think there is grave danger of hysteria also along that line. Experts going out to tell the farmers how to act, how to conserve, how to stop waste, and all of that; there is a good deal of foolishness in such business; but the food question, largely through the manipulation of speculators, will become a most serious proposition. We must have food. Is it not a perfectly silly thing to be taking the cereals of this country, whether in great quantity or in small quantity, and using them for the making of things that weaken us as a Nation in times of war as well as in times of peace? Drunken nations do not win wars.

Reference has been made here to England. England has gone a long way on this question; and, if I remember correctly the testimony of witnesses before the committee, some of whom have been over there, England has gone on lessening the consumption of alcoholic liquors and malt liquors until now, one witness stated to us—I do not know that the Senator from New York was present at the time—that after September, after the malt on hand is used up in the brewing of beer, England practically will become a prohibition nation. The King of England has given up his alcoholic drinks, at least for a while. Lloyd-George has stood for prohibition in England as a war measure; so has Kitchener.

The fact is that England would have had three and one-half million tons more of food if there had been no drink trade. That means a mighty thing to England. Suppose she had that food now. London would have been fed during this war by the foodstuffs that have gone into liquor. It is not a question of prohibition, but it is a question of good, common horse sense.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa if he can give us any information as to the amount of cereals that go from this country to the countries of Europe that are there consumed in the manufacture of drink?

Mr. KENYON. I can not; but I will say to the Senator that there is a considerable quantity of barley which goes abroad. We are met with the argument before our committee by the brewers that barley is not a food product or that it does not amount to much as a food product, although some years ago they advocated before the farmers that their business was helping the farmer along by using his barley and making a market therefor. Barley is a food product. Barley is used abroad in the debasement of flour. It was testified by Dr. Taylor before the Agriculture Committee that it was most satisfactory as a food and that the people were glad to get it.

There has been enough sugar consumed in England in the drink manufacture to feed the nation for 100 days. Those are merely incidental propositions, Mr. President. I am not going into detail along this line, but drink has done no good to any foreign nation. France is moving along the line now of getting rid of spirituous liquors. Gen. Joffre has called the alcohol question in France a "crime against national defense."

Mr. LEWIS and Mr. WADSWORTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator from Illinois. Let me say, however, before so doing that I object not only to using our grain and food supply in the making of intoxicating liquors in this country, but I also strenuously object to sending it abroad for such purpose. That is a crime against our people.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, without entering at all upon the discussion of the merits of the prohibition question or as to the advisability, and certainly the virtue, of preventing the food supply from being lessened by alcohol, I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa—and particularly to him I address this question—what is his judgment as to whether such an amendment as that tendered by his eminent colleague [Mr. CUMMINS] could be sustained under the recent opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States last month in what is known as the Webb-Kenyon Act case, where the observation was—unless I misquote the court—that the act of which the eminent Senator was part author was constitutional in so far as it was an act for the regulation of the liquor traffic; but if it were true, as was argued, that it was an attempt to regulate the purely internal concerns of a State, that it had nothing to do with the regulation of that which our National Government, through its excise laws, had exercised jurisdiction over, it would be invalid? I ask the Senator does he think we could pass a law now, even though upon this military bill, that attempted to prevent a certain number of ounces of wine entering into vinegar or into the making of crackers in a State, limited purely for local use, and where the food product was the superior ingredient and alcohol simply incidental?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, of course that gets back to the question we have been discussing here so many times concerning the power of Congress during time of war.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, a somewhat similar contention arose as to the Webb-Kenyon bill. It was stated that it was clearly unconstitutional, but the Supreme Court did not find it so.

Mr. KENYON. It was very strenuously contended by eminent lawyers in this body that there was no question of doubt about the Webb-Kenyon Act being unconstitutional.

Mr. LEWIS. I remember that the then Senator from New York, Mr. Root, insisted that it was unconstitutional, if I recall his argument aright.

Mr. KENYON. If I grasp the Senators question, I understand he was directing it to the point that the amendment of my colleague is an unconstitutional exercise of congressional power.

Mr. LEWIS. In a matter purely internal within a State, where the subject matter is not of an interstate character and is not a regulation of the liquor traffic per se.

Mr. KENYON. I do not know the exact language of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Iowa has expired.

Mr. LEWIS. I fear that I have taken too much of the Senators time because of my interruptions, and I will take the floor and yield to the Senator in a few moments so that he may have his time returned.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, with flour at $16 a barrel, and expected to be $20 a barrel in a very short time, with the cost of living constantly rising in this country and getting beyond the reach of hundreds of thousands of our people, and already beyond the reach of thousands of them; with bread riots, which have already actually occurred in this country, in New York City, Chicago, and other cities, where hungry women and children were rioting to be permitted to have bread at a reasonable price to appease their hunger, it is inconceivable to me that this Government will go very far into this war without prohibiting the manufacture of cereals into whisky. It is so inconceivable that I can not believe it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. MYERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. OVERMAN. This amendment goes further than that. It proposes to prevent the manufacture of any alcoholic liquors out of anything that is edible. Take molasses, for instance. I do not know how tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes are going to be manufactured without molasses. We want the revenue; and it is absolutely necessary to have rum to cure tobacco and to manufacture cigars and tobacco. To adopt such an amendment will work a very serious hardship in that industry. I do not know where we are going to get all the money for the needs of the Government if we deprive people of having tobacco as well as whisky. We obtain $400,000,000 from whisky and three or four hundred million dollars from tobacco. If you absolutely stop, for instance, the distillation of rum from molasses, you indirectly interfere with the manufacture of tobacco.

As to grain, that is another question; but would the Senator go as far as this amendment seeks to go and stop the distillation of every article which may be at all edible?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; of every article which may be edible. I have no fight to make, however, on tobacco. That is not my object in speaking.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I am talking now about rum obtained from molasses.

Mr. MYERS. Is it necessary to use molasses in the manufacture of tobacco?

Mr. OVERMAN. Not molasses, but rum is manufactured from it.

Mr. MYERS. Well, if it is necessary to use rum in the manufacture of tobacco, then let the Senator offer some amendment to the proposed amendment so as to modify the pending amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was asking the Senator whether he was willing to go as far as this amendment goes?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; I am willing to go as far as this amendment goes, or I am willing to have it modified. As I said, I have no fight to make on tobacco.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. MYERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If grain or any other product is needed for foodstuffs, it can very well be taken for that purpose instead of being used in connection with the manufacture of tobacco.

Mr. MYERS. I think so, yes; I think food is more necessary than tobacco.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not talking about anything but molasses. Grain, rye, oats, and such products constitute another question.

Mr. MYERS. With women and children already clamoring in the cities of this country for bread, and crying that they are hungry, and with the price of bread beyond their reach, I say it is inconceivable to me that we are going to go very far into this war without prohibiting the manufacture of cereals into whisky, beer, or wine. With our armies to feed and our people to feed, and the armies of the entente allies largely to feed, it is inconceivable to me that the Members of this Congress are going to sit here and allow hundreds of millions of bushels of this year's grain crop to go into whisky and beer. I can not believe it.

If we are going to remedy the situation; if we are going to enact a law providing that these articles shall be manufactured into something which will sustain our people and sustain our armies and help us to win this war, why not do it right now? Why wait until some other bill comes along? The objection that this bill is not a proper place for the proposed amendment is not a tenable or valid objection. If this is a good provision, if there is any sense in it, if we need it, we might just as well put the amendment in this bill as in any other. If we wait until some other bill is presented some Senator may say that that bill is not an appropriate place on which to place it.

I understand that a bill to control food products has already been introduced in the Senate, having been introduced yesterday by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. I do not know whether or not it has any such provision in it as this. I have not yet had time to examine it. If it has such a provision, well and good, but it is no better there than here. It might just as well be in this bill as in that bill, if it is a good thing.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MYERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. GRONNA. I think it is only fair to the Senator and to the Senate to state that there is no such provision as this in what is commonly known as the food bill. That bill has nothing whatever to do with the limitation of the manufacture of grain or any edible food into alcoholic drinks.

Mr. MYERS. I am glad to have the Senator's statement. Then this is our opportunity to do this necessary thing. The time to act on a matter of this kind is now. It can not be acted upon too soon. The food question in this country is becoming serious; the cost of living is getting beyond the reach of many working people, and our working people must be sustained in order to win this war. There are wholesale predictions of hunger and starvation in this country and in the European countries which are allied with us in the conduct of this war. I read nearly every morning in the papers about the probable employment of a food dictator. It is stated that Mr. Hoover will probably be appointed food dictator to control the output of the food of the country. If we are really in that serious condition, then we ought to take note of it; and this is the way in which to take note of it.

There has been a good deal said about England. If England had enacted absolute prohibition at the beginning of this war she would be infinitely better off than she is now. She would be hundreds of millions of dollars better off in food products; would have more food for her people and for her soldiers, and would not now be, as it is seriously reported in the dispatches that come from across the water, right on the verge of starvation before this year's food crop can be harvested. I think if things are becoming that serious, that imminent, we ought to act on this matter at once and not put it off until some other bill is brought along and some other objection is made.

I believe that legislation of this kind ought to be enacted right now, in time to save hundreds of millions of bushels of this year's grain crop from going into whisky, which would weaken us in this war, instead of going into bread which would strengthen us. If we are going to do it in time to save this year's crop from that sort of despoliation, waste, and ruination, now is the time. I am in favor of putting the amendment on this bill here and now.

Senators talk about wanting a thorough understanding of the matter. There is nothing to understand except one thing, and that is that bread will help us win this war more than whisky. That is the only thing that it is necessary to understand. We must have bread to win the war, but do not have to have whisky to win. That is all there is to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Montana has expired.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina to what extent the tobacco-manufacturing industry depends upon rum made from molasses?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know the extent, and therefore I must say that I am not informed. I know that a great deal of rum is used in the manufacture of tobacco. Whether they can use alcohol or cider, I am not sure. They might be able to do that. I know that a great deal of rum is used in the manufacture of tobacco, cigarettes, and cigars.

Mr. PHELAN. There is no law against the importation of rum for that or for any other purpose, is there?

Mr. OVERMAN. Not that I know of.

Mr. PHELAN. So it is not quite true that the tobacco industry depends upon the production of rum out of molasses in this country.

It seems to me that the Senator from Iowa in preparing his amendment overlooked one or two important considerations. It does not appear quite clear whether the amendment is intended for the conservation of the food supply or whether it is intended to prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. It may be claimed that it will serve both purposes; but in trying to accomplish the purpose of prohibition the language of the amendment, forbidding the production of intoxicating liquor, directly or indirectly, out of any cereal, grain, or other edible thing, strikes at many industries which are in themselves innocent, which give employment to a great number of people, and whose product is of great value as a food, and hence should not be disturbed.

In the State of California there are 350,000 acres under vine. There are $150,000,000 invested in the industry. Of course, the product of the grape is susceptible of being converted into alcohol; but those vineyards are used for the production of light wines which are regarded by the Department of Agriculture as being of food value, and hence they have been particularly diligent in that department to prevent the sophistication or adulteration of our native wines.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. PHELAN. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator inform the Senate what percentage of the people of the United States can afford to use wine as food, and do use it now?

Mr. PHELAN. Of course, the United States was not settled exclusively by people from the colder countries, who have no taste for light wines, but who indulge in spirituous and alcoholic liquors that are more ardent; but the people of France and of Italy and of southern Europe who came to the United States, and their progeny, used wine, I am safe in saying, in their daily diet as a matter of custom of a lifetime, and it conduces not to their detriment, but actually to their health.

Drink no longer water—

but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake.

That injunction has been placed upon them, and it has been their practice for generations to indulge in table wines. I can not say how many can afford it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if he is familiar with that other text:

Look not thou upon the wine when it is red.

Mr. PHELAN. I have always wondered why there was a discrimination made between wine when it is red and when it is white. My personal experience is that it is equally good, and that probably the more wholesome drink of the two is the red or claret wine, which has given to the French people very largely their élan, their spirit, not only their convivial life, which has been so attractive to Americans, but their endurance and their courage, and their spirit particularly—their esprit, as they call it—in time of war. I was told by a gentleman who has just come from the front that the difference between the action of the Latin people in war, as contrasted with that of the people from the colder nations, was rather surprising; that the latter were slow, and the wily enemy took advantage of them, whereas the dash and brilliance of the French has led to many unexpected victories. I do not know how far that is due to their practice of daily drinking wine in their families, not for the purpose certainly of intoxication, or even of exhilaration, but as a part of their daily diet.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. PHELAN. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. Speaking of the efficiency of the armies in Europe, the Senator knows, of course, that the Canadian Army has shown itself to be especially efficient. Does he think that they have been brought up on a wine diet?

Mr. PHELAN. I am not going to pretend to make an argument to the effect that the valor and courage of all nations is due entirely to their diet. Brillat-Savarin said, "You tell me what a man eats and drinks, and I will tell you what he is." The Canadians possibly indulge in wine; possibly they indulge in ardent spirits; but I believe—I am no advocate of ardent spirits—that in so far as they indulge in ardent spirits their efficiency is diminished.

But I do not wish to be diverted from the very few remarks I am allowed to make under the rule. I desire to say that this country must look, for instance, to the great production of grapes in California as one of the sources of its revenue and one of the means for giving employment to its people. If we abolish every industry which depends entirely upon the alcoholic use of the products, such as grapes, used in the making of light wines, then we destroy the industry and throw these people out of employment. But if you apply that rule to grains and cereals, it is not subject to this objection, because grains and cereals may be used for many other and possibly more wholesome purposes. So there can be no parity of reason as between the one and the other, unless the Senators are indirectly striking at any product which results in the making of alcohol. I do not think they claim that. They are for the conservation of food. We are all for the conservation of food, and therefore I say, for the purposes of this act and for the emergency of the war, it would be wise to require cereals and grains to go into actual food, and not into ardent spirits.

Therefore I am in favor of the amendment, so far as its limitations are confined to cereals and grains, and I would move, as an amendment, therefore, that the words "or other edible thing" be stricken out, and that there be inserted after the word "grain," in line 5, the words "sugar, or molasses," so that it will read:

It shall be unlawful to use or employ, directly or indirectly, any cereal, grain, sugar, or molasses in the production of intoxicating liquor.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I think it is the consensus of the scientific opinion of the world that alcohol when taken to excess is detrimental to the human system. It has been suggested that it makes the French soldier fight with more dash and daring. As to that I have no information. It may probably temporarily excite the imagination and liven up the intellect. Robert Burns says:

Leeze me on drink! it gies us mair
Than either school or college;
It kindles wit, it waukens lear,
It pangs us fou o' knowledge:
Be 't whisky-gill or penny wheep,
Or onie stronger potion,
It never fails, on drinkin deep,
To kittle up our notion,
By night or day.

That all may or may not be true; I do not know. I have been told that wine or whisky develops the power of oratory, kindles the divine afflatus, fires the imagination and promotes the writing of poetry, gives elasticity to the step, and paints landscapes upon the brain. Yes; it might do all of this, but I do not think it contributes to the stability of the laborer or makes for the lasting efficiency of the soldier. In truth, I do not think it does anybody any good under any circumstances. In my judgment, it is an unmitigated curse—dark, deep, and damnable.

The figures that have been submitted by the able Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] I think are correct. The subject matter has been discussed at great length in the newspapers, and every opportunity has been given to interested persons to refute them. But if there is any doubt about their correctness, I am willing to give the figures the benefit of the doubt. Personally I am satisfied with their correctness. Grain as it comes from the field is an asset to the Nation at this time—a positive, essential benefit to mankind. Turned into whisky, it becomes a very serious liability and an unlimited curse. Rather than convert grain into alcohol for beverage purposes, it would be better to destroy it absolutely. I think this legislation is good for peace and very much better for war; and I think the time to enact such legislation is right now. Now is the accepted time. It fits in, and it is the one redeeming item that will make the measure we are now considering not altogether bad. It will be the one mitigating, commendable feature in this bill.

As a revenue producer, let me inquire, who pays the revenue? The individual who buys the whisky. You had better tax him outright, because where the State gets one dollar from the sale the man who sells the liquor gets about seven. There is nothing of merit in the contention that this amendment will affect the Nation's Treasury revenue. It is the old argument that more information or light before acting is needed. Senators and people generally who are opposed to this character of legislation are never ready to act upon it. It is always convenient to postpone the consideration of measures of this character. More "information" is desired; "just wait a while and see if we can not get some light upon the subject."

There is no question before the American people to-day so thoroughly understood and about which thoughtful men so universally agree as the question of the effect of alcoholic stimulants on the human system. It is one of the great lessons that have been taught by the bloody war that is being waged in Europe to-day, and it is one that the American people can not afford to ignore at this time. The idea of taking grain, needed to feed the hungry women and children of this country, and converting it into a beverage which destroys the body and damns the soul is simply monstrous. The line of duty is so clearly marked out that I feel that it is an insult to the intelligence of the Senate to discuss it at all.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of this amendment. I would be in favor of such an amendment to our National Constitution in time of peace. I have been in favor of it for many years. I voted for substantially the same constitutional amendment while a Member of the House. I believe that the best thing for this country in times of peace is an absolute prohibition of the liquor traffic; but surely, now that we are in war, now when we need all our resources, when we ought to have every possible efficiency in conserving our resources, it is the wise thing and the best thing for all the people to abolish the use of liquors and save our grain for food; and, in my judgment, this provision will do it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. REED. The Senator states that he would be in favor of this measure in time of peace.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, sir. I voted for the nation-wide prohibition amendment a year or two ago.

Mr. REED. The Senator does not mean by that that he thinks in time of peace we could pass a Federal statute prohibiting the sale of liquor or the manufacture of liquor within the States, does he?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; but I think——

Mr. REED. That would require a constitutional amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. REED. Yes. Now, I want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Surely.

Mr. REED. If it would require a constitutional amendment in time of peace in order to do the thing that is now attempted to be done by a statute, where does the Senator find the authority for saying that in time of war the constitutional limitations are abolished?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that in a time of war, in a time of great national emergency, the common-defense and general-welfare clause of the Constitution of the United States would be ample authority for the enactment of this legislation. This clause is found both in the preamble and in the body of the Constitution, and surely being put in the instrument twice, the clause must have some meaning.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator know that the general-welfare clause has been made a joke?

Mr. McKELLAR. But this is not a time to make it a joke. I think this is a time to apply it. I think this is a time when it was intended by its makers that it should be used. It is in the Constitution. It is there twice. It means something. If it does not mean that we can exercise this authority to make this Nation an efficient Nation in time of war, if it does not mean that in a great war emergency like this when our every resources should be conserved and used for successfully carrying on this war, then I do not know of any reason for its being there; and it would be a joke under such circumstances if it could not be used. While there has been much division of opinion by the courts as to what this provision does mean, still I am confident that in this emergency our courts would give it a real meaning.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator know that under the general-welfare clause, as it has been construed repeatedly by the Supreme Court, there could be in time of peace no authority whatever for the passage of this legislation; that the general-welfare clause has been construed to mean merely the authority to carry out the powers that have been expressly or impliedly delegated to the Federal Government by the States?

Mr. McKELLAR. In the first place, this is not a time of peace. It is a time of the most serious war that we have ever had. In addition, if that is so, then this legislation could be upheld for the reason that the United States Government has the implied right, at any rate, to protect itself in time of war in the best possible manner, and I believe that the best possible way of this Nation protecting itself in this great emergency is to have a sober Army and a sober people, and to use its grain for the appeasing of hunger of the people rather than for the appeasing of an abnormal appetite on the part of a portion of our people for intoxicating and injurious liquors. This is a war measure. This is for the protection of the Government itself. It specifically provides that it is only for the period of the war.

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator one question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not much time, but I yield.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask the Senator if he has examined the case of Ex parte Milligan, read here in the Senate several times, in which in express terms the Supreme Court stated that in time of war the Constitution of the United States still stands, and it is the supreme law of the land?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am familiar with that case, and I think there is no question in the world about the soundness of the decision in that case; but at the same time, as we all know, in times of war the general clauses of the Constitution are usually invoked to uphold legislation the purpose of which is the common defense and the general welfare, and according to my recollection such statutes have invariably been upheld by our Supreme Court. I have no doubt our Supreme Court would uphold this enactment. For my part, I am willing to resolve the doubt in favor of sobriety and morality, in favor of efficiency, in favor of a guaranty of a full food supply for the people of our country in this time of great emergency. We ought to fight this war as a sober Nation.

Mr. STONE. Has the Senator considered the revenue feature?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course I have considered the revenue feature. It will take away a great deal of revenue, but it will make a better Nation, a happier Nation, a more efficient Nation, a richer Nation, a Nation more able to bear the tax burdens that must be placed upon it in this great crisis. If this Government must depend upon the revenue derived from liquor to uphold it, we ought to change our methods and subjects of taxation. We ought to raise the revenue in some other way. We ought to use these grains for the purpose of giving sustenance to our people, of giving the bread of life to our people, so that they can be efficient and sober, and so enable them to raise money to pay the taxes that are imposed. Let us impose taxes on some other subjects of taxation.

I am unwilling as one man to debauch the American people in order to raise revenue for the Government. I would gladly vote to-day to abolish the sale of liquors throughout the United States and lose every dollar of the revenue. We have thrashed this revenue argument out time and time again. We have had it up in Tennessee time and time again. There we have lost all the revenue that came from liquor, but at the same time our State is more prosperous and the people are happier and better and more able to pay taxes than they have ever been before. The same rule which applies to a State applies, in my judgment, to the United States. I believe that if we had no liquor and no revenue from liquor our Nation would be happier and more prosperous and a better Nation, and more able to pay these extraordinary taxes that we must impose. In taxing liquor we merely tax the people who drink liquor, and make the liquor dealer our tax collector. It has been estimated that we pay the liquor dealer $4 out of every $5 for collecting our Federal taxes. At the same time our people are debauched, corrupted, and sometimes ruined.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. STONE. We are all familiar with those arguments; they have been made a hundred times; but now we are engaged in framing a revenue bill that is to raise substantially $2,000,000,000 in taxes to be collected in the current year. I am asking the Senator—I am not sure I am right, but I am asking the Senator if I am right—if this amendment should be agreed to and you close all this source of revenue, then we would have to go about some way to find some means of raising several hundred million dollars of revenue which in the bill we are preparing would come from this source.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am perfectly willing to find some other way of raising the revenue. I am perfectly willing that the Government should lose the revenue that comes from this source if the traffic is abolished. I believe it would be better for the American people if that were so. I believe it would make us more efficient as a Nation in the time of this emergency. I believe further it would make our Army better when we send it abroad. We should not put our young men in training camps and allow them to injure or destroy their military efficiency, and perhaps their lives, by allowing them the use of intoxicating liquor. All the other nations which are at war have either forbidden or restricted the use of intoxicating liquor. In this matter, at any rate, I think we might well follow the examples of our allies. No drunken man was ever efficient in civil or military life. We need efficiency now as never before. We have before us the greatest task that ever confronted our people.

Mr. STONE. The Senator says he would wipe out these evil influences and these institutions that are evil influences and take some other means of raising the three or four hundred million dollars. Would the Senator agree to levy as a tax $2 a bale on cotton as a substitute? Would the Senator favor that?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not figured out whether $2 per bale on cotton would make up this deficiency in revenue or not; but I say I would rather see an ad valorum tax levied on all property, cotton as well as all other kinds of property, rather than to see a license given to the liquor dealers to sell our young men liquors, and thus make the liquor dealers tax collectors for our National Government, which system does nothing in the world except debauch the people of our country. I had rather tax cotton and other property than to tax those whose lives and fortunes are ruined by the legalized use of intoxicating liquors. The liquor dealers do not pay the liquor taxes. These taxes are paid by those who drink the liquors. A tax of $2 a bale on cotton would produce but $30,000,000. I do not single out any one subject for taxation, but I say we have sufficient legitimate property in this country to tax rather than to get the money in this way.

Mr. CUMMINS rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just one question. Of what use will revenue be to the United States if we have not enough to eat?

Mr. McKELLAR. The question answers itself. The Senator is exactly right. In addition to that, not only do we need this grain to furnish our people with something to eat, but if the amendment is adopted it will secure us a better and a more efficient army, because the young boys that we are to conscript into the Army would not be debauched when they go to fight for our country. At the same time it would give us a more efficient Nation.

Our country needs this grain to feed our own citizens. It needs it to feed our suffering allies. It needs the conservation of our every resource. Unless I am greatly mistaken, we have the fight of our life before us. We must take no chances. We must not at this time waste our substance in riotous living or more riotous drinking. Every man must make a sacrifice. There is no more beneficial service that a citizen can give than that of giving up drink during this crisis. There is no higher duty that this Congress can perform at this time than that of making our people a sober people during this war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I occupy a middle ground on the question of prohibition. The open saloon is offensive to me, but I am not a prohibitionist. I have been familiar from boyhood with the prohibitory law. It was on the books in the State of New Hampshire for about 50 years, but it was not enforced. In our larger cities, like the city of Manchester, there were open saloons most of the time under a strict prohibitory law. In one of our principal railroad stations beer barrels were in plain view of the traveling public, and in Portsmouth beer was manufactured openly. The prohibitory law was not enforced. I came to the conclusion that public opinion in New Hampshire was not back of it.

In 1902, when I was the candidate of my party for governor, I made a campaign against the prohibitory law and in favor of local option, and partly as a result of that campaign the prohibitory law was amended in New Hampshire in 1903, and a local-option amendment was passed. That has worked admirably in New Hampshire up to this time. But the prohibitory sentiment has been growing in New Hampshire, as it has all over the country, and at the last session of the legislature, about a month ago, the prohibitory law was reenacted; that is, it was brought into effect by repealing the local-option amendment. I have watched that movement with interest. I took no part. I exerted no influence, if I had any, with respect to the handling of the liquor problem in the New Hampshire Legislature. I was interested in seeing how the State stood.

I believe that the sentiment in favor of prohibition has advanced to such a point that the prohibitory law will probably be enforced very much better in New Hampshire than it was 20 years ago. But we did not in New Hampshire, in reenacting the prohibitory system, put it into force immediately. It takes effect May 1, 1918. We have given more than a year in which to readjust the business, so that on the 1st of May just passed liquor licenses were issued just as they were a year ago.

Now, I do not altogether agree with my prohibitory friends. I think they are apt to be fanatical and extreme. Nor do I altogether agree with my friends on the other side of the problem. They are very likely to be somewhat specious in their arguments. But I do feel that there is an inclination toward national prohibition as a war measure, and I hope that the matter will be handled in Congress at this session in such a way that we may have a reasonable law to that effect. If the President recommends it, if any committee charged with the purpose of investigating the food supply will recommend it and bring in a well-considered bill by which we can go to national prohibition as a war measure, without doing too much violence to anyone, I shall be glad to vote for it. Then if it works well as a war measure I shall be glad to vote to retain it as a peace measure. But I do beg the friends of prohibition not to chill off and alienate the support of men who take a middle ground by offering suddenly, without notice, such a very extreme amendment as this. I do not feel that I can vote for it.

To illustrate it by the tariff: The Democratic Party was in favor of a tariff for revenue only, but when they came to revise the tariff they decided that they could not fairly injure any existing legitimate industry. So far as the liquor interest is to-day under the protection of the law it is a legitimate industry. You may have to hurt it, you undoubtedly will hurt it if you go to national prohibition, but you should hurt it as little as possible, because there are many excellent men and women who depend on that industry for their support.

I wish that the matter might go over at this time that we might have the advice of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on the subject. We have to-day voted down the censorship provision of the bill not because the majority of the Senate are opposed to a reasonable censorship but because they do not favor as drastic a provision as was offered. Later, I have no doubt, if conditions are such that there should be authority to impose a more severe censorship, the Senate will vote for it by a large majority. So if it shall appear later, on mature consideration, that a reasonable and gradual imposition of prohibition should be applied by the Congress of the United States, a large majority will vote for it. I do not know but that a large majority will vote for the proposed provision now, but I can not vote for it myself.

We are more like England than any other country in Europe, and England has been imposing national prohibition gradually. I believe we can follow the experience of England in the matter of food control and prohibition with profit, as we are following the example of England in many other things connected with the war.

So, to restate my position, I can not vote for this drastic provision, which has not been adequately considered by a committee of the Senate, and I vote against it rather reluctantly, because I am aware that the arguments that I employ will be used by those who are very violently on the liquor side.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator from New Hampshire why he says that it has not been adequately considered by a committee?

Mr. HOLLIS. Because it has not been reported by a committee, perhaps I should say.

Mr. CUMMINS. It was offered in the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not know how seriously its members considered it, but it was voted on there, and I gave notice two weeks ago that the amendment would be offered at this time.

Mr. HOLLIS. When I said considered by a committee I meant, of course, favorably considered and reported. I should not think that an amendment of this kind ought properly to come from the Judiciary Committee. It should come from the committee that has charge more particularly of the food problem in all its aspects, and that would naturally be the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. CUMMINS rose.

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Would the Senator from New Hampshire apply that same rule to all the chapters of this bill?

Mr. HOLLIS. No; I am not applying any rule. I state my own personal view of it that this matter is closely connected with the matter of food supply and distribution, and I think it should come from the committee more particularly charged with the consideration of such matters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from California. I do not feel that his argument has changed my convictions, and yet I do feel that there is a sentiment among certain Members of the Senate that the phrase "other edible things" is too broad. I am so anxious to have legislation upon the subject to meet the three great things, namely, grain, sugar, and molasses, that I am inclined to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from California. I think it will accomplish, as far as the war is concerned, the immediate purpose in view, and, in so far as I can do so, I intend to accept it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Let me suggest to the Senator from Iowa that the word "molasses," perhaps, is not the word to be used, if he intends to exclude from the manufacture of alcoholic liquors edible molasses. The molasses out of which alcohol is made is not edible; it is the refuse of refined sugar, and up to the time that it was manufactured into alcohol it was thrown away. It would be thrown away now if not used in the manufacture of alcohol. It is not for human consumption. The word "sirup" probably would apply, because alcohol is made out of sirup also; but the word "molasses" is not the proper word. Sirup is edible. I understood the Senator from Iowa to accept the amendment of the Senator from California to add the words "sugar and molasses."

Mr. CUMMINS. I so stated.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I suggest to the Senator the word "molasses" ought not to be used if the purpose is to conserve matters like sirup, that enter into the consumption of food.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is my purpose.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Quite a number of factories manufacture alcohol out of molasses, and that molasses is the refuse of refined sugar and does not enter into human consumption. Not very long ago, I may say to the Senator, it was customary to throw it away, and the Government was put to a great deal of trouble to prevent the dumping of this molasses into navigable streams, thereby destroying the fish.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no prohibition against the manufacture of alcohol for mechanical, scientific, and medicinal purposes.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I understand; and my suggestion to the Senator is to substitute "sirup" for "molasses." In this way he will reach his point.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite willing to accept the Senator's better knowledge upon that subject. I assumed that molasses would cover the article I had in mind, but I am quite willing to have it read "grain, cereal, sugar, or sirup." So far as rum is concerned, in the curing of tobacco I do not believe it is used in curing any other tobacco than what is known as plug tobacco.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I merely wish to say to the Senator in all fairness to myself I am merely making the suggestion; I do not favor the amendment at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am making the suggestion to carry out the idea properly, which the amendment as presented did not do.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator believes that the idea that I have expressed is better interpreted by using the word "sirup" than the word "molasses" I am quite willing to accept it, and do accept it. I am not willing, however, to strike out the saccharine elements which are used for the purpose of making alcohol or rum. If we need rum for the manufacture of tobacco we can import all that we need of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California modify his amendment to the amendment?

Mr. PHELAN. That is agreeable to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

CHAPTER XIII.

SECTION 1. On and after September 1, 1917, and during the period of the war with the Imperial Government of Germany, and for one year thereafter——

Mr. CUMMINS. May I say there we have already adopted an amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri which limits the entire act to the period of the war? This amendment was drawn before that was adopted, and I desire to strike out the words "and for one year thereafter."

The SECRETARY. Strike out the words "and for one year thereafter."

Mr. OVERMAN. So it will read "during the period of the war."

Mr. CUMMINS. "During the period of the war."

The Secretary read as follows:

On and after September 1, 1917, and during the period of the war with the Imperial Government of Germany, it shall be unlawful to use or employ, directly or indirectly, any cereal, grain, sugar, sirup, or other edible thing in the production of intoxicating liquor in any form or of any kind.

Mr. CUMMINS. The words "or other edible thing" were stricken out on motion of the Senator from California; at least he proposed that they be stricken out, and there was substituted for that "any cereal, grain, sugar, or sirup."

Mr. PHELAN. Strike out the words "or other edible thing," so as to read "any cereal, grain, sugar, or sirup."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from California that that is the way the present occupant of the chair understood the amendment, but the memorandum which he sent to the desk did not embrace the words to be stricken out.

The SECRETARY. So that it will read:

On and after September 1, 1917, and during the period of the war with the Imperial Government of Germany, it shall be unlawful to use or employ directly or indirectly any cereal, grain, sugar, or sirup in the production of intoxicating liquor in any form or of any kind: Provided, however, That this section shall not be construed to make unlawful the manufacture of alcohol for mechanical, medicinal, sacramental, or scientific purposes, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. A violation of this section shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment of not more than three years, or both.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think it exceedingly unfortunate that an amendment of this kind should be offered at this period of the debate on the general bill which has been before us. We are confined to 10 minutes' discussion. There is no time to discuss the constitutionality of the measure. There has been no investigation by any committee; there has been no report. No human being can tell at this moment what the effect may be of this legislation. There is no time for the Senate to give it that mature consideration which ought to be given to any measure which will affect property of the value of hundreds of millions of dollars, which will affect the market for grain, which will affect the use or the manufacture of liquors for medicinal purposes. There is no opportunity to arrive at anything like a carefully considered conclusion.

I shall illustrate this in the moments I have. The Senator from Iowa drew this amendment and offered it. He has already been obliged to amend it three times. The Senator, we all know, is an able lawyer, but in the brief discussion that has come three amendments have been accepted to this short provision.

I call his attention to another, and I think he will accept that. The language of the section first prohibits the manufacture of any kind of intoxicating liquors and then excepts only the manufacture of alcohol. It does not permit the manufacture of an ounce of brandy to be served to a dying soldier on the field of battle or to a man needing a stimulant in a hospital. I do not believe the Senator meant that. I think the Senator meant to permit the manufacture of liquors for medicinal purposes in good faith.

Mr. President, where is the constitutional authority for the enactment of this law? Is there any use to appeal to the Senate to guard the Constitution? Every man in this body swore to maintain that old Constitution, and in his oath there was no provision to the effect that he could disregard the Constitution when it ran counter with his prohibition ideas.

I am not going to say here absolutely that this measure is unconstitutional, but I am going in the moment I have to point out some reasons which I think ought to give us pause. First, it is admitted that the right to enact legislation of this character does not exist in time of peace. It is admitted and has always been admitted by the advocates of prohibition that in order to enact a general national prohibitory law we must first amend the Constitution of the United States. This Government of ours is not a government of unlimited power. As long ago as the days of John Marshall it was declared that—

The Government of the United States can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution; and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given or given by necessary implication.

Again, it is said that—

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

Again, it is said that—

The fourteenth amendment does not take from the States police powers reserved to them at the time of the adoption of the Constitution.

So it stands and must stand as admitted that in time of peace the Federal Government has no authority whatsoever to enact a statute of this character, and that that power can never be exercised by the Federal Government until by an amendment to the Constitution the power has been expressly conferred; and up to this hour it has been conceded by the advocates of prohibition that the Constitution must be amended in order to achieve this result.

Mr. President, that brings us to the next question. Does the mere fact that the United States Government is at war abrogate the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, or, to state it differently, is there to be found in the war powers of the Federal Government a general power to disregard the Constitution of the United States in all respects?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Because if there is not found in that war power an authority to do things that have not hitherto been regarded as within the power of the Congress, then we do not possess the power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. I have only about one minute. I wish the Senator, therefore, would kindly make his suggestion when I have concluded; otherwise I would be glad to yield. I can not in this time finish my statement. I am not prepared to say that there may not an emergency arise during the existence of a war which, having arisen, may not give to the Federal Government almost undreamed-of power; but I do not believe at the present time and under the existing conditions that this Government has the authority to pass a law of this kind.

That is my opinion; but under the circumstances confronting us—the amendment is offered here, the 10-minute rule is on, with no time to examine authorities, with no time to examine history or precedent—I say we ought not to be forced to vote upon this question; we ought not to exercise this doubtful authority.

As a final word—if I may have the privilege of talking for a moment all by myself—as a final word, I say that every argument that the Senator from Iowa has made in defense of the Constitution rises up now to condemn this proposition, which is clearly an offense against the Constitution, if any of these matters against which he inveighed so eloquently a few days ago were against the Constitution.

Mr. President, Congress ought to pause; we ought not to do this hasty thing. I am willing to go as far as the Constitution will permit me to go in order to conserve the foodstuffs of this country——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. WOLCOTT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise simply for the purpose of asking the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] a question in my time, if he will be kind enough to give me his attention. He has referred several times to what he designates as "war powers." The inquiry, I suppose, in his mind being whether we can do things because we have declared war under some war power that is greater than the power of Congress in time of peace. What does the Senator mean by the words "war power"?

Mr. REED. Well, I used that term for want of something better. I meant to refer by that to the power which is vested in the Congress of the United States to declare war, to grant letters of marque and reprisal, to make rules concerning captures on land and water, to raise and support armies, to provide navies, to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, to provide for calling forth the militia, and so forth. Those are the enumerated war powers of Congress. In the execution of those powers there are certain things, of course, the Government can do in carrying them out. My own notion about it is—and I hesitate to give it without time to consider the matter and time to examine authorities, but stated under these limitations and almost hardships—I would say that my own notion is that until our country is actually invaded, so that the civil powers have broken down, there is no law in this country, save the laws passed pursuant to the Constitution of the United States and of the constitutions of the several States; that the Constitution of the United States stands unimpaired and unimpeached; and that the only authority which can be exercised during a time of war that can not be exercised during a time of peace is within a zone where the civil power has broken down.

Under the authority of Congress to raise armies and to raise navies and to provide for the defense of the country, I think that the power of Congress with reference to the armed forces is almost supreme—perhaps quite supreme; but that authority must be limited, in my judgment, to the armed forces. For instance, we can undoubtedly prohibit the use of liquor among the troops or in the Navy, because they are expressly placed under the power of Congress; but I very much doubt the right of this Government to go outside the Military Establishment and to enter the domain of the several States, and there undertake to regulate the habits of the people or the use of the property of the people within those States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if I may take the rest of my time myself—I only have two minutes now left——

Mr. KENYON. I should like——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will yield to the Senator from Iowa if he wants to read something from the Constitution.

Mr. KENYON. I was going to ask the Senator from Missouri if he gave any force and effect to subsection 8 of Article I of the Constitution on the question of the war power; but I shall not take the time of the Senator from Connecticut to do so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am perfectly willing that the Senator should put that in in my time or in his time, either.

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who has just taken his seat, has made a statement which I think will be questioned by no Senator; that is, that this proposed amendment would be utterly unconstitutional were it enacted in time of peace. This is, perhaps, not the first question, but it is one of the questions that are coming before us in a series of questions as we progress with legislation that is going to be proposed to us. I think it is of some importance that some proper and fair discussion should be given to the very weighty questions that arise on an amendment of this kind before it is acted on by the Senate. I think that consideration alone would be sufficient to warrant any Senator in voting against this amendment. The question of whether or not Congress, having exercised its power to declare war—and the President being under the Constitution the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy—whether, those two things existing, they absolutely suspend or repeal every constitutional guaranty and limitation in the Constitution of the United States is a very serious question, to which this Congress ought to give its attention before it establishes the precedent of enacting legislation of this kind.

It has heretofore been supposed that private property could not be taken for public use without just compensation and without due process of law; and yet here is an amendment proposed—whatever may be the merit of it or the cause that it represents—which will destroy millions and millions of dollars' worth of property, legitimately earned and legitimately invested, which at present, or a few days ago, was supposed to be under the protection of the constitutional guarantees of this country. It is proposed to pass lightly, under a 10-minute debate, a proposition which any time before the last 60 days would have taken weeks of debate in this Senate, and an examination of the cases which have been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and which would have been, when proposed, accorded a lengthy hearing before committees of both branches of Congress, to ascertain not only whether we have the legal power to enact such legislation, but what would be its effect upon the vast industries of this country, the commerce of the country, and the investments of the people; the question how the enormous amount of revenue gathered from the liquor business not only into the National Treasury but into all the State and municipal local treasuries of the various parts of the country is to be supplied; the amount of property that would be destroyed in real estate, the amount of property that would be destroyed in agriculture and on the farms. Those things surely ought to be given some fair consideration, whatever a man may think about the wisdom or the policy, if he could have his way regardless of law, of establishing Nation-wide prohibition. It seems to me that no Senator, unless he is prepared to take advantage of the abnormal and unusual condition existing now internationally, unless he is prepared to take advantage of that situation for promoting the prohibition propaganda, would want to vote for an amendment of this kind.

This is not all in the interest of prohibition against the use of intoxicating liquors, but it is offered, nominally at least, as a proposition to conserve the food supply. However, it ought to be known in advance what the effect of the proposition as a conservator of food would be—whether it is really going to result in the planting of more cereals and in the cultivation of more food products or not.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], I thought, made a very fair appeal to the Senate when he said that this great question of the conservation of the food supply was now being examined and the testimony of experts was being taken before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of this body. Only yesterday the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] introduced a prepared bill, which has had the consideration of the Agricultural Department to carry out the conclusions arrived at.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Oklahoma introduced the bill by request.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I shall have to modify my remarks to that extent. I did not know the bill was introduced by request; but there is either a bill or a proposition of some kind pending in the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate, which that committee has taken days to investigate, and on which expert testimony has been had. I think this subject could fairly await the investigation of that committee.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I want to discuss two features of this matter. One relates particularly to the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN]. That Senator is not here and I should be glad if he were present before I say what I have to say. I will therefore make the point that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Lewis	Shields
Bankhead	Gerry	Lodge	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Gronna	McKellar	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Hale	Myers	Smoot

Broussard	Husting	Norris	Sutherland
Calder	James	Overman	Thomas

Curtis	Kendrick	Reed	Weeks
Fernald	Kenyon	Robinson	Wolcott
Fletcher	King	Shafroth
France	Kirby	Sheppard
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Sherman

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have no intention of discussing what is ordinarily called the prohibition question in its usual and larger aspects. That subject has been debated in the Senate, in the House, in the press, and in the country for a time so long that I think all the arguments that have ever been made or ever can be made for or against prohibition are as well understood by everybody as our language alphabet. I have no thought, therefore, of repeating, either in abbreviated or amplified form, what I have said on former occasions relating to that subject; but there are two things connected with the amendment now pending before the Senate to which I think Senators should give attention.

The first of these is the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. The amendment of the Senator from California proposes, as I caught it in the reading from the desk, to strike out, in line 5 of the Cummins amendment, the words "or other edible thing" and to insert the words "sugar or sirup."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that that amendment was accepted by the Senator from Iowa and has been agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Well, if it has been agreed to as an amendment to the amendment, at least the whole amendment has not been agreed to, but is still pending.

I desire to call attention to the fact that as the amendment now stands it is proposed to prevent the use of any cereal, grain, sugar, or sirup in the production of intoxicating liquor in any form or of any kind. "Sugar or sirup" are the words that have been put into the so-called Cummins amendment by the Senator from California; and that is what I want to talk about.

Here is what I think that amendment means—and I have requested the presence of the Senator from California that he may correct me, not in my time, for my time is not sufficient for that, but that he may correct me in his own time if he thinks I am in error. We had a long fight in the Senate and in the Congress, not only through one session but through several sessions, over the wine schedule. The struggle was between the California producers of wine, on the one hand, and the Ohio, Michigan, and Missouri producers of wine—I mean the States producing wine this side of the Rocky Mountains in competition with the wine production of the State of California—on the other hand. Now, among the things fought over here in the Senate and in the other House was this, whether sugar might be used by the wine makers of the Middle States, upon whom the grape growers of that section depend, for ameliorating purposes in the manufacture of wine, and to what extent it might be used for ameliorating purposes. That question was fought out and settled by the enactment of a statute now on the statute books of the Nation, adopted after a long and somewhat acrimonious fight in the Senate and in the other House.

Now, the Senator from California, who represents a California wine-growing constituency, proposes to make it a crime to use sugar in any alcoholic production. What would be the effect of that? The effect would be to nullify the statute I refer to. The effect would be to destroy the manufacture of grape wine in the Middle Western and Eastern States in the interest of the manufacturers of wine in California. This proposal is merely to revive the same old fight. That is all I have time to say on this subject at this time. The Senator from California can answer if I am wrong. I protest against opening up this old fight again, especially in this way.

There is one other point—and I have to hurry—to which I wish to attract the attention of Senators, if I can, with respect to the main body of the Cummins amendment. Mr. President, suppose this amendment is written into the law—and I do not care the snap of my finger any more than you do whether it is or not, except as it involves certain great public interests of immediate moment. We are framing a revenue bill now. If you will go down to the Finance Committee room, you will see a great swarm of men assembled there from all over the country, protesting, every one of them, in some form or other against particular taxes severally affecting them, and some of them seem to be making out what at first blush appears on the surface to be pretty good cases.

Mr. President, it is proposed by this revenue bill to raise one thousand eight hundred and odd million dollars, to be levied on the taxpayers of the country, which is in addition to the already enormous war taxes and the normal peace taxes the people are already bearing. If this amendment is put on this bill, do you know what you would cut out of this revenue bill? You would eliminate from it approximately $350,000,000, or about one-fifth of the entire amount we have got to raise by the bill by further burdening the industries and the taxpayers of the land. The present revenue derived from alcoholic drinks is approximately $200,000,000, and we are proposing by the pending revenue bill to add to the tax paid by this class of manufacturers another $150,000,000, making the total, as I have said, approximately $350,000,000. Now, wipe this out, and we have got to get it somewhere else. I asked the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] when he was on the floor, calling his attention to this fact, what he would do, and he said, "I believe in morality, sobriety," and so on—making the old argument usually made—"and," he said, "I would rather shift this burden somewhere else and shut off the manufacture of alcoholic drinks at all hazards." Well, but upon whom would you shift the burden? Here is this bill made up and reported, and we are now considering it in our committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. No; I can not yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not for a question?

Mr. STONE. With all due respect, no. I would yield to the Senator as quickly as I would to any Senator, as he knows, but my time is nearly up and I want to finish this statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know the Senator has not much time.

Mr. STONE. Now, Mr. President, the revenue bill is being made up. The Senator from New Hampshire is one of the most distinguished members of the Finance Committee, and he sees the crowd and he sees the difficulties we are in. Where are we going to shift this $350,000,000? Upon whom is it to fall? I asked the Senator from Tennessee if he would be willing to place it largely upon the cotton States, imposing a tax of so much per bale on cotton. He rather evaded a direct reply to that question, but said that he was willing to put it upon property generally. Mr. President, when you come——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. No; I can not yield. When you come to the question of shifting this vast sum of $350,000,000 on to property generally, on what property are you going to shift it? I lay these questions before you, Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri states that one of the objects which the amendment would accomplish would be to discriminate against the wine producers of the East and the Middle West, and in favor of those of California.

Mr. STONE. I expressed that as a grave suspicion.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a point of order. I do not want to take the Senator from California off his feet, but I want to inquire if the Senator has not spoken once on this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has not. He spoke on his own amendment, which was subsequently agreed to; and the Chair assumes that he is speaking now on the amendment as amended.

Mr. REED. On the main amendment? I was curious to know.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator from Missouri must not be aware that I was challenged by his colleague to make a reply.

Mr. REED. I am. Let me say, without taking it out of the Senator's time——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is within his rights.

Mr. REED. That was not my object. I wanted to get at the point of the discussion, if I might be permitted, as a matter of personal privilege. I wanted, not to take the Senator off his feet, but to get at the point we had reached in the discussion as to what amendment we were discussing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa as amended. The Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator from Missouri says there is a grave suspicion that the amendment to the amendment, which reads—

> It shall be unlawful to use or employ, directly or indirectly, any cereal, grain, sugar, or sirup in the production of intoxicating liquor in any form or of any kind—

Will have the effect of discriminating in favor of the wine producers of California as against those of the East and the Middle West. It is true, as he states, that in the making of wine in California, where the sunshine accomplishes the work, there is no necessity for adding sugar in order to make a palatable beverage, but it is the practice in Missouri and Ohio and possibly other States to add sugar for the purpose of supplying the deficiencies of the natural saccharine matter contained in the grape. This was all thrashed out last year, and I am merely stating a fact. I do not desire to make any reflection whatever upon the merits of the wines produced in these States, because our cause here to-day is a common cause. Of course, I had no purpose whatever to discriminate against the wines of Missouri, and if this language admits of any such interpretation, for my part I will accept any language that will accomplish the purpose recommended by the Senator from Missouri. But it makes it unlawful, directly or indirectly, to employ any cereal, grain, or sugar in the production of intoxicating liquor.

Now, in common practice liquor is always distinguished from wine. The vendor advertises "wines and liquors"; and I do not know that, colloquially or commercially, wine is classified as intoxicating liquor. Thus the very language of the orignal amendment would protect the wines of Missouri, unless it is admitted that the wine of Missouri, or of California, for that matter, is "intoxicating liquor." If that be a true interpretation, that wine is not contemplated at all by the proponents of the original amendment, but only intoxicating liquor, there would be no danger; but this speaks of the use of sugar in the production of intoxicating liquor. This sugar, as I understand, is not used for the purpose of increasing the alcoholic content of the wines of the Middle West. It is used merely for the purpose of sweetening, and therefore it possibly diminishes the intoxicating quality of the wine, if it has any at all. So I say a fair construction would be that the sugar is not used in the production of intoxicating liquor and that the wine itself can not be classified as intoxicating liquor.

If the Senators have any suggestion as to any language which would better protect their industry, I am quite agreeable to its acceptance.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I desire to move an amendment: In line 8 of the typewritten copy which I have in my hand I move to insert, between the words "alcohol" and "for," the words "or intoxicating liquor," so that, if amended, the proviso will read as follows:

> Provided, however, That this section shall not be construed to make unlawful the manufacture of alcohol or intoxicating liquor for mechanical, medicinal, sacramental, or scientific purposes.

My purpose in offering that amendment, Mr. President, is as follows: Unless those words be inserted we will have a provision excepting from the unlawful act the manufacture of alcohol for mechanical, medicinal, sacramental, or scientific purposes. Now, it is a well-recognized fact that alcohol certainly is not manufactured for sacramental purposes, nor, I submit, is alcohol manufactured very extensively for medicinal purposes, but intoxicating liquors are manufactured for both medicinal and sacramental purposes.

I think, therefore, it is very necessary, if the amendment is going to become a law, that the words "or intoxicating liquor" be inserted at the point I have suggested.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, it seems that there have been but two arguments presented against this amendment. One is as to its constitutionality and the other is as to the matter of revenue.

The liquor interests of this country have been driven to their last stand in their fight against prohibition. The only argument now upon which they rely is the argument of revenue and taxation. They would have us believe, both in State and in Nation, that it is important, if not essential, that we should have this product as a means of raising revenue. They have had to abandon every other argument. The progress of scientific and medical investigation has proven every other argument that they have advanced fallacious, and I believe that this is equally fallacious with the others.

Many are inclined to think that the liquor industry pays a revenue in this country, in Nation, in State, in county, and in municipality. As a matter of fact, the liquor industry pays no revenue at all. It is merely, to a small extent, a tax collector, and it is the worst tax collector ever known. Those engaged in the manufacture and in the sale of alcoholic liquors pay no taxes except what they collect from the consumers.

If this amendment should go through, it might be true that the Committee on Finance would have to find some other method of raising this revenue; but you are not destroying a source of revenue when you wipe out this industry. The revenues turned in by the liquor interests in this country are paid by the consumers, indirectly. You would have to change the tax system to some extent to get that much money in some other way, but I believe that the consumer would be in a much better position to pay this revenue in some other way than to pay it through the liquor process.

I do not know just what the percentage is, but it has been estimated that a very small percentage of the money that is paid over the counter in a saloon by the consumer goes into the Treasury either of the State or of the Nation. I have heard it stated that it was not over 20 per cent. It would be much better to leave in the hands of the consumer all of the money that he pays for liquor and send your tax collector to him direct, or in some other way than this way, to collect what you may need from him. It would be infinitely better for the consumer and for the taxpayer that you should shift this burden, even though it may reach the enormous figures suggested by the distinguished Senator from Missouri of $350,000,000, to some other source of revenue. I do not think the Senate should hesitate for one minute on the mistaken idea that the liquor industry is a valuable or legitimate or profitable source from which to raise revenue.

The other argument that has been advanced is one of constitutionality. Have we a right under the Constitution to adopt such an amendment as this? I am frank to say that there may be some doubt about it, but I am inclined to think that we have such a right. The section of the Constitution referred to by the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]—section 8, of Article I—says:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

It is recognized to-day, especially since the outbreak of the European war, that one of the most important features of national defense and safety is the question of liquor regulation or prohibition. We have seen the Governments of Europe, one by one, since this war began, adopt laws to prohibit entirely, or to restrict to some extent, the use of alcoholic stimulants during the war. I believe, therefore, that this is a matter of common defense.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BECKHAM. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. The Senator gives to the words "provide for the common defense" the wide meaning now attributed to them, namely, that under the term "provide for the common defense" you can stop the use in the United States of grains or of fruits by the owners in a manner which is perfectly lawful under the laws of the communities where the food exists. Then why, under the term "common defense," may not the Federal Government take over every single power it sees fit to exercise, without any limitation whatsoever, and say that it has the right to do it as a matter of common defense? If that be true, then it means, does it not, that the Constitution of the United States is set aside the minute we declare war? And is not that what the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Milligan and in other cases, expressly said did not take effect?

Mr. BECKHAM. I think, Mr. President, that under that section we do not have to set aside the Constitution in time of war to justify the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. KENYON and Mr. HARDWICK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield, and to whom?

Mr. BECKHAM. I yield first to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. If the Constitution itself expressly provides that certain things may be done, then you are not setting aside the Constitution when you do them.

Mr. BECKHAM. Certainly not. You are acting within the Constitution.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BECKHAM. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator has given to section 8 of Article I a construction that I do not think has ever been given to it by any Democrat in the history of the country before. The Senator says, reading the section—

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States—

Construing the latter section of the paragraph separate and alone. The truth is, as a matter of history and as a matter of constitutional law, that the general power of Congress is to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises for the purpose of paying the debts and providing for the common defense and general welfare of the country. The last clause does not stand alone, and never anywhere has any such power been conferred on Congress as the Senator from Kentucky suggests, in my judgment.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, if that means anything at all, it certainly means that Congress has necessary discretion in determining what shall be done for the common defense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, in the few moments that I speak upon this very important measure I am not going to discuss it from the constitutional standpoint or the standpoint of revenue. I want to speak upon it from the standpoint of right and of common, ordinary fair play.

I am against prohibition, although I have never taken occasion to say a word upon that subject in the Senate, and I am not going to talk about that now. In fact, I do not think the adoption of this amendment should turn upon that question. I do not think, when we are discussing war measures that under the guise of war measures the advocates of prohibition should take advantage of the situation to press that question. This matter ought to be decided from the standpoint of sound public policy at this time.

Now, whether it is constitutional or not, whether we will need the revenues or not, the question seems to me to be, Is it necessary at this time to do a thing which will carry in its train untold hardship and suffering on the part of a large number of people and disaster and ruin on a business that has been fostered under Government license? I take the position that the presumption is in favor of the power of the Government to do everything that is reasonably necessary to carry on the war. That is the attitude that I have taken and that I propose to take on measures touching the carrying on of this war generally; but here the question is, Are you going to do something that is not necessary, at the expense, to the injustice, and to the ruin of a great many people of the United States.

I subscribe to the remarks made by the distinguished junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], and it will not be necessary to repeat what he has already so well said. Here, in about three hours' talk under the 10-minute rule, we are asked to take a position that may mean the confiscation of hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of property, the ruination of business, the throwing out of employment of hundreds of thousands of people, not because it is necessary to do it at this time or expedient to do it at this time, but because, forsooth, some of the advocates of prohibition want to take advantage of this opportunity to do it. I say that I do not think that is fair play.

For instance, take the situation in my State. In the city of Milwaukee there are hundreds of millions of dollars invested in property connected with this industry. There are tens of thousands of people employed in this industry. It does not touch the beer-manufacturing industry alone. It goes into the malting business, and from that business it ramifies into a great many other businesses that you in the twinkling of an eye, without consideration, are absolutely without proper consideration and without a hearing going to destroy. The amount and value of property affected by this amendment throughout the country must run into billions of dollars, and millions of people are employed and earn their livelihood in the same.

Now, it is said here that this shall be only for the period of the war. You might just as well make it forever, because if you interrupt for the period of two or three years the manufacturing industries of this country engaged in the production of beer, or business connected therewith, you have destroyed them forever. So it is not just a momentary putting out of business. It means the absolute destruction of this line of business.

Now, I am not narrow enough, I hope, to oppose measures harmful for my State when such injury is suffered by us because of necessity for the serving of our country, but because we make sacrifices I want to know that they are necessary, that the sacrifice is not in vain but merely in the promotion of a sentiment which has nothing to do with war.

As far as revenues are concerned, and as far as they are connected with the consideration of this matter, I beg to state that the fact that we have been receiving these revenues from this industry shows that we recognize it as a legitimate industry; that we are receiving the revenues by permitting them to continue in this business. Therefore they are entitled to this consideration—that they should not be deprived of their business without warning, without hearing, without discussion, without consideration by Congress; that they and their fortunes and their properties, their welfare, shall not be put absolutely out of existence without warning and without notice.

I say again, that if this matter were being considered, and it appeared necessary or vital for the safety of this country, for the success of our arms, to do this I do not think anyone is in a mood to say that, hard and harsh as it may be, it might not be wise to do that; but I say that the burden of proving that it is necessary is upon those who propose to commit this drastic and harsh act, constitutional though it may be. But no showing has been made to prove that this drastic, confiscatory remedy is necessary, nor that the injury, devastation, and ruin, and that the suffering amongst the millions of your people is not beyond reason above the advantages that the country would enjoy as a result of such prohibition. They are not giving the consideration that they should to respectable and decent men and women in this country who have engaged and are engaging in this business under permission and sanction of the law and society. This business is legalized. These men are entitled, at least for the time being, to carry on this business, and the right ought not to be interfered with except upon the grounds of supreme public importance, as a war measure and vitally necessary for a proper conservation of our food supply.

This question, as I said before, involves hundreds of millions, if not billions, of dollars in this country; it affects the livelihood, welfare, and happiness of hundreds of thousands of citizens of this country who are to be discriminated against without a show of necessity and without notice, warning, or hearing. I am not talking now in behalf of those who like to indulge in these beverages but of those who are engaged in this business as a matter of right. They are entitled to fair and proper consideration here. If, upon full investigation, and in the wisdom of this Congress, it decides that on the matter of general principle we should go into prohibition that is another proposition; but here is a war measure. Without any evidence brought here before the Senate or without any discussion or consideration worthy of name, because of the shortness of the time, I say that we have no business, we have no right as a matter of fair play, to put into effect this drastic legislation that may mean—yes, will mean disaster and ruin—to hundreds of thousands, yes, millions of people in this country.

Now, we have talked about war and about sharing the burdens of war. Let us not, right at the outset, make this burden rest or put the penalty upon a particular class who are engaged in a business in which, perchance, some of the Members of Congress do not believe. That is not the question. The question is whether you want to do unto others as you would have them do unto you, and whether we, without, I say, consideration worthy of the name, are going to pass this law, which means the practical destruction of this industry throughout the United States and the ruination and suffering of millions of people. There are bills now before the Agricultural Committee bearing upon this question. These committees have held hearings and will make a report to the Senate, and the Senate will then have the time to give this tremendously fateful bill the consideration it deserves and to which those interested are entitled. I could only vote for an amendment like this at this time when I am convinced that it is necessary. I can not and will not do so on mere conjecture and to satisfy what I conceive to be the desire of those who are quick to take an undue advantage of the situation and to encourage their desire for nation-wide prohibition.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am very sorry that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has accepted the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN]. I was also sorry to hear the statement made by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] that, in his opinion, the conservation prohibition bills, which are now pending before the Agricultural Committee, stand very little show of being reported out of that committee. I am a member of that committee, and I had hoped that it would be possible to report out some measure that would not only prohibit the manufacture of cereals into alcohol, but that would provide for redistillation of whisky into alcohol for war purposes, and I want to say to the Senators here that that is a big question.

There is to-day in bond more than 250,000,000 gallons of whisky. There is perhaps about 50,000,000 gallons more on the shelves and in the houses of the saloon keepers; so that in all we have at least 300,000,000 gallons of manufactured whisky. That alone will supply the people of this country for at least two years; and unless we provide for redistillation of all this liquor on hand, I do not believe that this can be said to be a prohibition measure, although I shall vote for it.

Now, the Senator from California has offered his amendment and it has been accepted by the Senator from Iowa. The Senator from California has, of course, in good faith represented the wishes of the people of his State to protect the grape industry, and I believe it will be only fair to say that grapes may be used for something besides drink. Grapes can be manufactured into food as well as grain may be manufactured into food.

I come from a State, Mr. President, where the principal industry and practically the only industry is the production of grain. North Dakota is the largest grain-producing State in the Union. Yet, Mr. President, in the bill which I offered I did not attempt to except any agricultural product in my own State. On the contrary, grain was the first article that I specified in my bill. I provided that no cereals should be used; and I want to say for the information of those who have not looked it up that the word "cereal" includes all grain. It includes rice. There is no necessity for having the word "grain" together with the word "cereal." If you strike out the comma between the two words, you will place a limitation upon the language and you will simply authorize that no grain shall be manufactured into alcoholic liquors, but rice, millet, and other cereals may be used in the manufacture of alcohol. You may take rice or you may take any other farm product and manufacture it into beer. Anyone who has looked into this question knows that millions of bushels of rice are being used in the manufacture of beer.

More than that, Mr. President, you may use all the fruits of this country and manufacture them into brandy. So you could supply the country with the quantity which is now on hand for two years. It will not be difficult for the manufacturer of brandy to manufacture all the brandy that can be used in the United States out of the fruit raised in this country.

Mr. President, being a layman, I shall not argue the constitutionality of the question. I simply want to state that I believe when the very life of the Nation is at stake we have a right to conserve the food products. You provide in this bill for a censorship of the press. You at least place a limitation upon the rights of the people guaranteed by the first amendment of the Constitution and say that they shall not be allowed free speech. But you are afraid that this measure here is unconstitutional in placing a limitation on what shall be manufactured when that very article, as I said, might be the very means which will sustain the Nation and save the Nation from calamity.

Mr. President, we have had before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry hearings for weeks. We have all the information that has been sought by the committee, and we have given people representing these various industries an opportunity to be heard. We have had the brewers before the committee; we have had the distillers before the committee; and we have had the prohibition people before the committee.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GRONNA. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator has the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry made a report upon its hearings?

Mr. GRONNA. No; I will say to the Senator it has not. I am in hopes that it will make a report soon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I interrupt to say that the hearings are not even printed?

Mr. GRONNA. I will state that not all of them have been printed, but a part of the hearings have been printed.

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] called attention to the large sums of money to be raised as taxes, and he asked the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] if he would be willing to have the cotton of the country taxed. I believe it would be better for the people of this couptry to go into their pockets to pay the $350,000,000. I do not say in which way you shall levy this tax. Anything that will produce efficiency, anything that will conserve the food products of this Nation which must be conserved, should be done, because, based upon the report made the other day by the Agricultural Department, we know that the production will be less than 400,000,000 bushels of winter wheat. We know that never in the history of this country have we produced as much as 250,000,000 bushels of spring wheat. That makes a total of less than 650,000,000 bushels—less than the amount we consume in the United States in a single year.

But regardless of that, I believe we should do all that is in our power to conserve the 110,000,000 bushels of grain used in the manufacture of alcoholic liquors. That is the amount that the brewers and the distillers admit is used in the United States, to say nothing about what is exported and manufactured into alcoholic liquors in other countries. That question was raised by the Senator from Montana, and it is a very important question.

Mr. President, I have a bill pending before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and I ask unanimous consent to print the bill as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be granted. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill introduced by Mr. GRONNA and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is as follows:

A bill to conserve the agricultural food products of the United States and to prohibit their manufacture into alcoholic liquors, except in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of conserving during the present war all agricultural food products and to prohibit the manufacture of said food products into alcoholic liquors it shall be unlawful during such period for any person, firm, corporation, or association to use for manufacture into alcohol or alcoholic liquors any cereals, vegetable, fruits, or any agricultural food product: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the Government of the United States, through the Secretary of Agriculture, from issuing to any person, firm, corporation, or association a license to use any such agricultural food products in the manufacture of alcohol for use in the manufacture of high explosives, or for any other purpose necessary to carry on the war, or for sacramental or mechanical purposes.

SEC. 2. That the manufacture, sale, or gift of any alcohol or alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited, but it shall be lawful for any person, firm, corporation, or association to use, manufacture, or redistill into alcohol for manufacture of explosives or other military, industrial, or scientific purposes any and all intoxicating liquors now in existence and which may have been manufactured or distilled prior to the passage and approval of this act; and when such liquor is so used, manufactured, or redistilled the tax thereon, as now provided for, shall be waived or refunded. All the provisions of this act shall be carried out under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

SEC. 3. That any person, firm, corporation, or association who shall violate the provisions of this act shall be guilty of felony and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment at hard labor not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. GRONNA. If I understand the parliamentary situation, there is now an amendment pending to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. Am I correct in that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. GRONNA. After that amendment shall have been disposed of I shall offer my bill as an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to state that two measures of this character have been introduced into the Senate and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, one by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], the other by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will report one or the other of those bills at an early date, if the pending amendment is not adopted. I have referred both bills to the Secretary of War, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of the Treasury, requesting suggestions that would render the measures capable of administration. I do not mean to say that they are not properly drafted, but it is a matter of the highest importance to permit the continued manufacture of distilled liquors for use in the manufacture of explosives. I desire to have the bill as carefully drawn as possible before reporting it to the Senate. I expect a report from these Secretaries in a few days, and when received the committee will be ready to report upon one or the other of the measures.

While I am on my feet I will say that I favor legislation of this character designed to conserve the grain, the cereals, now used in the manufacture of this sort of liquors. The hearings revealed the fact that some 110,000,000 bushels of grain and cereals are devoted to this purpose. That aggregates 6,000,000,000 pounds—enough, it is estimated, to feed 20,000,000 human beings for an entire year. Lloyd-George is reducing the amount of grain or cereals permitted to be used in the manufacture of such liquors in England. He expects to effect a total saving of some 600,000 tons—enough to feed the entire population of Great Britain for a full month.

There is some doubt as to the constitutionality of a measure looking purely to prohibition. Based upon conservation, however, and upon the exigencies of war, it might possibly survive the constitutional test. For my own part, I am in favor of approaching the problem from every standpoint—through the taxing power, through the commerce clause of the Constitution, and from the standpoint of conservation—in a measure similar to the amendment now pending. The present war may become a battle of bread, a contest of commissaries.

I wish to call to the attention of the Senator who introduced this amendment this possibility: Liquor could be manufactured from grain in other countries and be shipped into the United States. Liquor could be manufactured, from sugar and molasses in Cuba and shipped into the United States, or manufactured in some of the other countries. Liquor could be manufactured from grain, even in the allied countries, and shipped into the United States.

It seems to me that we ought to change the amendment so as to prevent the importation of intoxicating liquors manufactured from grain or cereals, molasses, and sirups subsequent to the approval of this act. Otherwise 100,000,000 bushels might be shipped into Mexico, manufactured into intoxicating liquors, and shipped into the United States. It seems to me that that at least is worthy of the Senator's attention.

I should like to see the word "military" inserted after the words "mechanical, scientific," and so forth. It is a matter of the first importance to permit the manufacture of sufficient distilled liquors to provide for the manufacture of an adequate supply of explosives. I think every doubt on that point ought to be removed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, allow me to inquire whether the pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] to my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am opposed to that amendment. That is all I need to say about it. But I wish to reply for a moment to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. I recognize that liquor may be imported from other countries into the United States, so far as this legislation is concerned. It seems to me that the proper place to deal with that subject is when we come to revise the revenue laws, which we are about to do. I understand we are about to revise the tariff law of the United States, and we can very easily provide with respect to the importation of liquor.

I am perfectly willing to add the word "military," although I do not think it essential. I think "mechanical" and "scientific" would cover the purposes which the Senator from Oklahoma has in mind; but there is no objection on my part at all to the addition of the word "military." I am trying to do an obvious thing. I am trying to do the thing that is immediately before us, namely, to prevent the conversion of grain or cereals of any kind into intoxicating liquor pending this war. If we accomplish that much, we will have done a great deal; and if the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is able to report a more comprehensive measure, one that better cares for the situation, and Congress shall pass it, no one will rejoice more than I.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the Senator from Iowa takes his seat I wish to ask him a question. I wish to ask him frankly if he believes this amendment of his is constitutional.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that is a pretty hard question. If the Senator from Missouri had asked me that question before we began upon the war legislation, I would have expressed a great deal of doubt upon it; but the Senate has taken a position with regard to the Constitution and with regard to the legislation which we may pass under it in view of the fact that we are in war that I am willing to accept for the time being, anyhow, that, tested by the standards which the Senate—and House, too, for that matter—have established, the amendment is constitutional.

Mr. REED. You mean the standards that are established in the pending bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. The standards that seem to be established everywhere and accepted everywhere, namely, that we can do whatsoever is necessary to preserve this country from destruction.

Mr. REED. That is a little indefinite, and I really want to get an answer. I regard the Senator's opinion on a constitutional proposition as of great value. There is a pending bill. It has a lot of things in it. Against most of them the Senator has protested that they were unconstitutional. Am I to understand that because the Senate has voted to accept many of the provisions of the bill the Senator has changed his mind in regard to the constitutional question?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I have not; nor do I say that this is unconstitutional. The Senator from Missouri himself said a few moments ago that he had doubts with regard to the matter, that under the war power of Congress we might pass legislation of this character. I am in very much the same state of mind. I have never had occasion before to survey the field nor determine just what a nation could do in the throes of war. The subject is a new one to me. I have already expressed my opinion about it at very great length, and I see no reason to change the opinions I have expressed. All that I say is that if a tithe of what has been said with regard to the constitutionality of things we have already adopted is true, there can be no doubt about the constitutionality of this amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. May I ask the Senator from Iowa a question before he takes his seat?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator if he has given careful thought, knowing as I do that he gives careful thought to all the questions that come to his attention, to the question of the constitutionality of the bill we are now considering, in view of the provisions contained in the first amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which reads as follows:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have given somewhat careful thought to that point.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator not think that the bill we are considering absolutely violates the provisions of the first amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have so said several times, that there were certain parts of the bill which do violate the first amendment of the Constitution as well as the fourth and fifth amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yet it does not seem to phase the Senators who are disclaiming against the constitutionality of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. No. I have become perfectly numb about the Constitution. I have been trying to sustain it as best I could, but the argument seems to have fallen upon deaf ears, and I regard this amendment as the least invasion of the Constitution that has been proposed——

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so, too.

Mr. CUMMINS. If it is an invasion at all.

Mr. REED. As I understand that argument it amounts to this, that the Constitution having already been ravished we are now proceeding, having established the right under custom, to utterly disregard it. It is the first time I have ever heard announced in the Senate of the United States the doctrine that because the Constitution has been invaded thereby an excuse is afforded to Senators to utterly disregard the instrument.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I do not profess any knowledge of constitutional law, as the Senator knows; I am very modest even in what I think I do understand in asserting; but what I meant to say was that it is surprising to me that Senators accept the provisions of this bill in view of the inhibition in the first amendment to the Constitution, without question apparently, and yet they are horrified apparently over this amendment on the ground of unconstitutionality. That was the point I intended to make.

Mr. REED. I do not think the two questions are in any respect parallel. Those who have voted for the provisions of the bill which have now been accepted by the Senate have done so in the belief that those provisions can be justified under express powers granted by the Constitution. Now, there arises a question, however, of a different character.

Let me say, Mr. President, while I am on my feet, that so far as I am concerned I want to see the food of this country preserved. I am not discussing this question at all from the standpoint of the liquor interests—nothing of that kind—but I am protesting that we ought not to enter upon a vast field such as this opens up under a 10-minute rule of the Senate, without time to examine the Constitution or the precedents, and that we are to have this provision hung on here regardless of the fate of the bill itself. You may concentrate so much opposition to the bill that when we come to a final vote it will be defeated either here or in the other House. We might be a good deal wiser if we attempted less at one time. I should like to have an opportunity before this matter is disposed of to spend an hour or two in the law library and look at the authorities. I have one here before me that appears to go squarely against the doctrine which was announced by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] a short while ago, yet I am not prepared from my hasty examination of it even to submit it to the Senate. I intend to hand it to the Senator from Iowa too look it over.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I said a few words when I introduced the amendment. I suppose my time now will come under a discussion of the bill. I do not propose to speak more than a minute.

I wish to say that I offered the amendment because it seemed to me in the interest of sanity and reasonable language. The Senator from Iowa says he is opposed to it without giving any reasons. I can not understand what real reason there can be against the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if the amendment of the Senator from Iowa as it now stands becomes a law the Senate of the United States will have written into law a provision that it is lawful to manufacture alcohol for sacramental purposes. It seems to me it is the height of absurdity to suppose that in taking sacred sacrament pure alcohol is used, or that they take intoxicating liquor at the sacrament. They do not take, so far as I am advised, pure alcohol as a medicine. They take intoxicating liquor in some form as a medicine. Therefore the amendment should read:

> Provided, That this section shall not be construed to make unlawful the manufacture of alcohol or intoxicating liquor except for mechanical, medicinal, sacramental, or scientific purposes.

I want to vote for the amendment in some form, Mr. President, but if the absurdity I have pointed out remains in it I shall not vote for it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, when the amendment now offered was pending before the Judiciary Committee I voted, as a member of that committee, against incorporating it in the bill which was to be reported to the Senate. Since that time information has come to me which has given me the greatest concern about the food supply for the immediate future, both for our own people and for the people of the nations allied with us in the prosecution of the war in which we are now engaged. I feel entirely satisfied that the successful prosecution of the war depends in no small degree on the conservation of every available supply of food. I am accordingly constrained to vote in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa as a part of the pending bill.

I want to say a word, Mr. President, concerning the constitutional aspect of this matter. Of course no one can feel that the question of the power of Congress to legislate as is now proposed is entirely free from doubt. Confessedly there is no right in Congress thus to legislate unless it springs from the exercise of the war power. The advocates of national prohibition have long recognized that in order to invest Congress with power in time of peace an amendment to the Constitution is necessary. It becomes a question, then, as to whether this legislation fairly falls within the power of Congress arising from its authority to wage war.

If, Mr. President, at any time in the discussion of this bill or any other measure the idea has been advanced upon the floor of the Senate that in time of war the Constitution or any of its provisions are suspended or inoperative, I desire to have it distinctly understood that I subscribe to no such doctrine. I do not recall, notwithstanding the assertions to that effect, that any Senator has announced any such doctrine. Nor, Mr. President, are we required by any means to arrive at the conclusion that in order to sustain legislation of this character we must subscribe to the doctrine that the Constitution is suspended or inoperative in time of war.

That the Constitution authorizes the National Government to wage war against a foreign enemy is a proposition which no one will controvert. It is unnecessary to advert to the specific provisions of the Constitution from which springs that power. Perhaps it would follow as some other powers follow from the mere existence of this country as a Nation. But, Mr. President, I think the attention of the Senate might appropriately be directed to a provision of the Constitution which is to be considered in connection with the war power to which reference has not been made heretofore in the present discussion. I refer to section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution, which provides that—

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion.

Mr. President, we entered this war because of a profound conviction which had seized hold of the minds of our people that we were not entirely free from invasion by an enemy upon the other side of the water, and it is to protect our people against an invasion from a great military power which without our intervention threatened to overwhelm Europe that we were finally prevailed upon to cast our fortunes with those in arms against that great power.

This is declared to be a war of democracy against autocracy. We are not knight-errants going into the controversies of another continent merely for the vindication of an abstract principle. We recognize in this war of autocracy against democracy that democracy in this country may be overwhelmed by triumphant autocracy, and that is the only justification for our entrance into the war at all.

Now, Mr. President, every one of the great nations engaged in this war upon the other side of the water is brought face to face with the proposition that they must conserve and regulate their supply of food as the most essential condition of triumphing in the war. Even this morning we are told by the commissioners who are here from Italy that Italy asks ships and food, not men. Every one of the warring countries allied with us is looking to this country to augment their food supply in order that they may prosecute vigorously this war.

Then, Mr. President, I submit that it is not an unreasonable proposition to say that the conservation of the food supply in this great emergency is so intimately related to the successful conduct of the war as that the preservation of it comes fairly within the power granted to the National Government to wage war and to protect the States of the Union against invasion by a foreign foe.

Mr. President, it is not free from doubt, but why should we hesitate in this great emergency because some one may have some doubts with respect to the constitutionality of it? It will be tested out quickly. This act will hardly have passed when some appropriate proceedings will be taken by the great interests that are affected by this legislation to test before the courts the power of Congress in the premises. What the outcome will be I do not, of course, undertake to predict, but I feel easily justified in disregarding any suggestion that the act will be in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

I do not care to discuss the merits of the question. I think that the Senator from Iowa acted wisely in not subjecting this provision of the bill to the chance of being declared unconstitutional, by taking out the clause which made it effective for a year after the war; because, as I said, if it is to be justified at all, it must be justified as an exercise of the war power.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, in view of the amendment which was offered by the Senator from California, I desire to say a few words with reference to the pending question.

The amendment as it now reads makes it "unlawful to use or employ, directly or indirectly, any cereal, grain, sugar, or sirup in the production of intoxicating liquor in any form or of any kind." This has been so framed, with the amendment included in it, which was offered by the Senator from California, that the wine interests of California will be protected and those in the States east of the Rocky Mountains will be entirely destroyed, because in the manufacture of wine, and particularly sweet wine, it is found that the grapes which are grown east of the Rocky Mountains are lacking in sugar and have a little too much acid. The grapes in California have too much sugar and not enough acid. The manufacturer of wine east of the Rocky Mountains uses sugar and water; the manufacturer of wine in California uses acid and water. Without the use of the acid, the wine would not be used as a beverage, or at least it would not be used to the same extent.

Dr. Johnson, I believe it was, defined oats as being a food for men in Scotland and for horses in England. If he were to define California wine he would say the wine with the acid added would be good for men, but without the acid it would not be good for men.

I allude to the situation for the purpose of showing the utter unfairness of the provision as applied to sections of the country east of California. It seems to me that if you are going to prevent the manufacture or use of intoxicating liquors the law should be so framed as to prohibit it absolutely and not to give to my very good friend from California and his constituents a monopoly of the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. I think the pending amendment should be changed in some way so as to wipe out this distinction.

There is another feature of this amendment to which I desire to call attention. It forbids after September 1 the use of any cereal in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. I am informed that a large amount of cereal is always existent in the form of a malt. That malt clearly can not be used for human food if this amendment to the bill is to be adopted; and it will be a complete loss unless it can be used in part for animal food.

There is another thought that I wish to call to the attention of the Senate. If it shall be demonstrated that there is any lack or that there is likely to be any lack of cereals for food purposes any man, no matter what his views might be upon this subject, would take a given position with respect to the food supply. There clearly can be no doubt as to what a man's duty would be if it were a question between having sufficient food and of having intoxicating liquor. I think we could all agree upon that proposition; but to-day I do not have reliable information as to what the real food supply is. I listened very attentively to the debates here to-day upon this subject. It has been asserted that there is not a sufficient food supply; but I differentiate between assertion and fact. If it can be shown to me that, as a matter of fact, there is not a sufficient food supply, I will vote one way——

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does not the Senator think the declaration of the Agricultural Department and the report of bills for the purpose of limiting the use of food and fixing its price furnish some evidence on this subject of a lack of supply; and is not that true also when we consider the prevailing prices of articles in this country?

Mr. POMERENE. No; the prevailing prices have very little to do with it, as I shall demonstrate in a moment. It has not been reported to the Senate what is the Agricultural Department's view. Only yesterday, or the day before, I saw a statement purporting to come from the Agricultural Department to the effect that in Canada and in the United States there were 40,000,000 bushels of wheat more than were needed for our own consumption and for the purpose of feeding the allies until the new grain crop is available. Whether or not that is true I do not know.

Mr. SHIELDS. What, then, is the necessity for this legislation and for this agitation about increased prices and the conservation of food?

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator from Tennessee will content himself for a moment, I will have something to say upon that subject.

Mr. SHIELDS. I thought it was very pertinent in connection with what the Senator was saying.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will wait, I am about to dwell upon that subject. I have been trying to investigate this subject as best I could in connection with other duties that I have had to perform. I am satisfied that the question of supply and demand has something to do with the present prices, but it has not all to do with it, by any means. There are attempts to corner the grain market and other food supplies of this country, and that has had more to do with the price of cereals than has the question of supply and demand. There is no doubt about it, and I am eager to find a way to bring those men to book.

Again, I think that present prices are due to some extent to psychological causes. Everybody is advancing prices everywhere on every article of manufacture. There has been talk about the lack of a food supply until people begin to believe it and to fear it, although they do not have the necessary proof upon the subject.

Again, I am satisfied that the one influence that has had more to do with the present prices of grain and of cereals is the lack of transportation facilities. Let me give you a few instances which have come to my attention within the last few days. I have here on my desk to-day a letter received from the Carr Milling Co., of Hamilton, Ohio, in which they say that at present they have large quantities of grain—wheat—in the elevators at Toledo. Another gentleman, in talking to me on this subject—I think it was the Representative from that district—said to me that they had 50,000 bushels of wheat in the elevators at Toledo, but they could not get a car to move it to Hamilton, a distance of perhaps a little over 200 miles. Of course, that has something to do with the increased price of foodstuffs.

The other day, before a subcommittee of the Interstate Commerce Committee, one of the members of the Public Utilities Commission of the State of Minnesota testified that at that time there were 25,000,000 bushels of wheat which had been sold in the State of Minnesota and were ready for delivery—5,000,000 bushels of it to the allies and 20,000,000 bushels to the American millers—but that there was not a car in sight with which to move this grain. From information which I have received from other sources, I am led to believe that the condition which exists in Minnesota to-day prevails in nearly all the other wheat-producing States of the country. I hope that we shall soon have some method by which we can handle this car-shortage proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment which has been submitted by the Senator from Iowa.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is now a pending amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, am I in order to offer an amendment which does not affect the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not until we dispose of the amendment of the Senator from Delaware. We have reached the third degree, which is only permissible under Rule XVIII.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. STONE. The Senator will pardon me for a moment. I desire to present an amendment which I will offer when it is in order, and I am asking to do so in order that the Senator from California, the Senator from Iowa, and others who are interested may take occasion to examine it either in the RECORD or otherwise.

I wish to amend the amendment of the Senator from Iowa by inserting, after the word "kind," in line 11, the following:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall prevent the use of sugar or sirup in the manufacture of wine, as now authorized by existing law.

That would necessitate a slight change in the second proviso, merely by adding after what I have suggested the words "And provided," and striking out the word "however" and inserting "further."

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] simply desires to state an amendment which he proposes to offer, it will be in order, of course, to do so, although it can not be considered until the amendment of the Senator from Delaware shall have been disposed of.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am willing to wait until the Senator from Delaware has his amendment disposed of.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri has spoken on this amendment, according to the record.

Mr. REED. I do not so understand. I asked a question of another Senator. I do not desire to trespass on the rule, but I am very confident I have not spoken on this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Missouri under his statement of the facts.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to weary the Senate, but there is nothing so useless and so senseless as to pass an unconstitutional law, which simply results in consuming time that might be employed to do something of a practical character. If we do not possess the power to enact this law, and we enact it believing that we are going to accomplish something, and weeks and months are consumed in testing its constitutionality, and then it is found to be unconstitutional, we have lost that much time which might be employed in enacting a measure that would have been constitutional. For instance, if there is a real shortage of food, and if we adopt this as the means of meeting that difficulty, and then find out that all we have done is valueless, we have lost the time that might have been employed in providing some device or scheme which would have conserved the food supply. So I appeal to Senators to give this matter very serious consideration.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me for an interruption?

Mr. REED. Yes; but I will ask the Senator to be very brief, as my time is so limited.

Mr. WALSH. I direct the attention of the Senator to this thought: That any kind of legislation that we adopt for the regulation of the entire food supply of the country would be equally obnoxious to the objection now made.

Mr. REED. I understand that proposition very clearly. I agree with the Senator. Therefore I am saying that we ought not to thrust this matter in now, to debate it halfway under the 10-minute rule. I have been looking up some authorities here, although I have not gone into them to the length that I should like; but I call the attention of Senators, and particularly the attention of the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], who in a conversation with me stated—indeed, he so stated on the floor—that he thought possibly that in section 8 of Article I of the Constitution, which reads—

SEC. 8. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States—

A power could be found to authorize this legislation.

Mr. KENYON. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. I should want to couple also with that the provision with reference to raising and supporting armies.

Mr. REED. Yes; I want, first, to discuss section 8 by itself. The power to raise and support armies is given in a separate clause. The Senator specifically called my attention to section 8.

Mr. President, I do not claim to have gone to the bottom of this question; but, so far as I have gone, the authorities seem to indicate that the power to provide for the common defense is coupled with the power to levy taxes, and that the clause means that the Congress for the common defense shall have the power to levy taxes; and that is all that it means.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. REED. I would if I had the time.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the words "for the common defense and general welfare," in section 8, are the same as the general words in the preamble.

Mr. REED. Oh, very well; but I do not know the import of that suggestion. Here is the construction that high authorities have placed upon this language. I read from Story on the Constitution. He quotes section 8 of the Constitution, which I ask to insert without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The section referred to is as follows:

SEC. 8. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Mr. REED. The author then says:

Before proceeding to consider the nature and extent of the power conferred by this clause, and the reasons on which it is founded, it seems necessary to settle the grammatical construction of the clause, and to ascertain its true reading. Do the words, "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," constitute a distinct substantial power; and the words, "to pay the debts and to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," constitute another distinct and substantial power? Or are the latter words connected with the former so as to constitute a qualification upon them? This has been a topic of political controversy, and has furnished abundant materials for popular declamation and alarm. If the former be the true interpretation, then it is obvious that under color of the generality of the words to "provide for the common defense and the general welfare," the Government of the United States is, in reality, a Government of general and unlimited powers, notwithstanding the subsequent enumeration of specific powers; if the latter be the true construction, then the power of taxation only is given by the clause, and it is limited to objects of a national character, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and the general welfare."

The former opinion has been maintained by some minds of great ingenuity and liberality of views. The latter has been the generally received sense of the Nation, and seems supported by reasoning at once solid and impregnable. The reading, therefore, which will be maintained in these commentaries is that which makes the latter words a qualification of the former.

I ask to insert in the RECORD at this point, without reading, the remainder of that paragraph.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

And this will be best illustrated by supplying the words which are necessarily to be understood in this interpretation. They will then stand thus: "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, in order to pay the debts and to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States;" that is, for the purpose of paying the public debts, and providing for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. In this sense Congress has not an unlimited power of taxation; but it is limited to specific objects—the payment of the public debts and providing for the common defense and general welfare. A tax, therefore, laid by Congress for neither of these objects would be unconstitutional, as an excess of its legislative authority. In what manner this is to be ascertained or decided will be considered hereafter. At present the interpretation of the words only is before us, and the reasoning by which that already suggested has been vindicated will now be reviewed.

Mr. REED. A little further on the author says:

The Constitution was, from its very origin, contemplated to be the frame of a national government of special and enumerated powers and not of general and unlimited powers.

I ask that the remainder of that paragraph and the subsequent paragraph be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

This is apparent, as will be presently seen from the history of the proceedings of the convention which framed it; and it has formed the admitted basis of all legislative and judicial reasoning upon it ever since it was put into operation by all who have been its open friends and advocates as well as by all who have been its enemies and opponents. If the clause, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," is construed to be an independent and substantive grant of power, it not only renders wholly unimportant and unnecessary the subsequent enumeration of specific powers, but it plainly extends far beyond them and creates a general authority in Congress to pass all laws which they may deem for the common defense or general welfare. (President Monroe's message, May 4, 1822, pp. 32, 33.) Under such circumstances the Constitution would practically create an unlimited National Government. The enumerated powers would tend to embarrassment and confusion, since they would only give rise to doubts as to the true extent of the general power, or of the enumerated powers.

One of the most common maxims of interpretation is, as has been already stated, that, as an exception strengthens the force of a law in cases not excepted, so enumeration weakens it in cases not enumerated. But how could it be applied with success to the interpretation of the Constitution of the United States if the enumerated powers were neither exceptions from nor additions to the general power to provide for the common defense and general welfare? To give the enumeration of the specific powers any sensible place or operation in the Constitution it is indispensable to construe them as not wholly and necessarily embraced in the general power. The common principles of interpretation would seem to instruct us that the different parts of the same instrument ought to be so expounded as to give meaning to every part which will bear it. Shall one part of the same sentence be excluded altogether from a share in the meaning; and shall the more doubtful and indefinite terms be retained in their full extent and the clear and precise expressions be denied any signification? For what purpose could the enumeration of particular powers be inserted if these and all others were meant to be included in the preceding general power? Nothing is more natural or common than first to use a general phrase and then to qualify it by a recital of particulars. But the idea of an enumeration of particulars which neither explain nor qualify the general meaning and can have no other effect than to confound and mislead is an absurdity which no one ought to charge on the enlightened authors of the Constitution. (The Federalist, No. 41.) It would be to charge them either with premeditated folly or premeditated fraud.

Mr. REED. Then, further in the same connection, in paragraph 911, Judge Story says:

On the other hand, construing this clause in connection with and as a part of the preceding clause giving the power to lay taxes, it becomes sensible and operative. It becomes a qualification of that clause, and limits the taxing power to objects for the common defense or general welfare. It then contains no grant of any power whatsoever, but it is a mere expression of the ends and purposes to be effected by the preceding power of taxation.

That was the conclusion of Judge Story, and the conclusion of Judge Story is concurred in by Watson, in his work on the Constitution. I ask to insert the language on pages 392 and 393 and a portion of the language on page 394, which I will indicate to the Reporter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

St. George Tucker has said: "The principle on which the right of taxation is founded is here shortly expressed, namely, 'to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States'" (1 Tucker's Blackstone, App. 231), thus limiting, in his opinion, the purposes of the taxes, duties, etc., which the preceding clause of the Constitution authorized to be collected, to the payment of the debts and providing for the common defense and general welfare of the country.

But perhaps the most exhaustive and philosophical discussion of this question is found in President Monroe's message to Congress of May 4, 1822, in which he gives his reasons for vetoing an act of Congress "for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland Road." (This message contains the most exhaustive discussion extant on the power of Congress, under the expressed and implied provisions of the Constitution, and is, therefore, one of the most valuable contributions to our constitutional literature, and has been quoted from freely.) "It is not claimed by the friends of this bill," said President Monroe, "that any direct authority exists for passing it, but that such authority is implied from various expressions of the Constitution, and, among others, the power conferred upon Congress 'to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.' This claim has less reason on its side than either of those which we have already examined. The power of which this forms a part is expressed in the following words: 'Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.' That the second part of this grant gives the right to appropriate the public money, and nothing more, is evident from the following considerations: First. If the right of appropriation is not given by this clause, it is not given at all, there being no other grant in the Constitution which gives it directly or which has any bearing on the subject, even by implication, except the two following: First, the prohibition, which is contained in the eleventh of the enumerated powers, not to appropriate money for the support of armies for a longer term than two years; and, second, the declaration of the sixth member or clause of the ninth section of the first article that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. Second. This part of the grant has none of the characteristics of a distinct and original power. It is manifestly incidental to the great objects of the first part of the grant, which authorizes Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, a power of vast extent, not granted by the Confederation, the grant of which formed one of the principal inducements to the adoption of this Constitution. If both parts of the grant are taken together (as they must be, for the one follows immediately after the other in the same sentence), it seems to be impossible to give to the latter any other construction than that contended for. Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. For what purpose? To pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, an arrangement and phraseology which clearly show that the latter part of the clause was intended to enumerate the purposes to which the money thus raised might be appropriated. Third. If this is not the real object and fair construction of the second part of this grant, it follows either that it has no import or operation whatever or one of much greater extent than the first part.

"This presumption is evidently groundless in both instances. In the first because no part of the Constitution can be considered useless; no sentence or clause in it without a meaning. In the second because such a construction as made the second part of the clause an original grant, embracing the same object with the first, but with much greater power than it would be in the highest degree absurd. The order generally observed in grants, an order founded in common sense, since it promotes a clear understanding of their import, is to grant the power intended to be conveyed in the most full and explicit manner, and then to explain or qualify it, if explanation or qualification should be necessary. This order has, it is believed, been invariably observed in all the grants contained in the Constitution. In the second because if the clause in question is not construed merely as an authority to appropriate the public money, it must be obvious that it conveys a power of indefinite and unlimited extent; that there would have been no use for the special powers to raise and support armies and a navy, to regulate commerce, to call forth the militia, or even to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. An unqualified power to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare, as the second part of this clause would be if considered as a distinct and separate grant, would extend to every object in which the public could be interested. A power to provide for the common defense would give to Congress the command of the whole force and of all the resources of the Union; but a right to provide for the general welfare would go much further. It would, in effect, break down all the barriers between the States and the General Government and consolidate the whole under the latter.

"The powers specially granted to Congress are what are called the enumerated powers, and are numbered in the order in which they stand, among which that contained in the first clause holds the first place in point of importance. If the power created by the latter part of the clause is considered an original grant, unconnected with and independent of the first, as in that case it must be, then the first part is entirely done away, as are all the other grants in the Constitution, being completely absorbed in the transcendent power granted in the latter part; but if the clause be construed in the sense contended for, then every part has an important meaning and effect; not a line, a word, in it is superfluous.

Mr. REED. I simply state, in passing, that Watson reaches exactly the same conclusion as Judge Story did, that the words "provide for the common defense" do not grant a distinct and new power, but that they are qualified by the words "levy taxes," and that the clause means the same thing as though it read "the Congress shall have power to provide for the common defense by levying taxes for that purpose." Now, to the same effect——

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. I am afraid my time is about up. Let me put this in the RECORD, and then I will yield.

Mr. BECKHAM. Very well.

Mr. REED. To the same effect is Willoughby on the Constitution, volume 1, paragraph 22, page 39. The author there states:

22. "Common defense and general welfare."

The declaration in the preamble that the new Union is established for the common defense and general welfare, and the grant by Artile I, section 8, of the Constitution to Congress of the power "to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," has at times been argued to be equivalent to a grant to the General Government of all powers, the exercise of which may in any way contribute to the effectuation of either of these ends.

Especially by those who desire to magnify the powers of the Federal Government it has been argued that instead of construing section 8 of Article I as simply the grant of an authority to raise revenue in order to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, it should be interpreted as conferring upon Congress two distinct powers, namely, (1) the power of taxation and (2) the power to provide for the common defense and general welfare. And under the latter of these two grants, it has been argued that the Congress has the authority to exercise any power that it may think necessary or expedient for advancing the common defense or the general welfare of the United States. It scarcely needs be said that this interpretation has not been accepted by the courts. Were this view to be accepted the Government of the United States would at once cease to be one of enumerated powers, for it would then be possible to justify the exercise of any authority whatsoever upon the ground that the general welfare would thereby be advanced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I could answer it in the Senator's time, if he has any.

Mr. BECKHAM. I have exhausted my time, I think.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Well, we will have to keep somewhere near the rule.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I did not expect to say anything on this amendment until I heard the discussion that has been going on with relation to the shortage of crops and the amount of cereals which we export to foreign countries. I sent for the World Almanac, a publication that contains numerous statistics, generally taken from the reports of the Agricultural Department of the United States Government. It is said that there is no shortage, or at least that there is no certainty that there will be this year, and there is a large quantity in storage.

Mr. President, I turn to page 283 of the World Almanac for 1917, and I find these figures as to the production of cereal crops in the United States during the last two years:

In 1916 we produced 2,717,000,000 bushels of corn; the year before, 1915, we produced 3,054,000,000 bushels—I leave off the thousands. So, Mr. President, it will be seen that there was a shortage in last year's corn crop compared with that of the preceding year of about 337,000,000 bushels.

I take the next item—wheat. There were produced last year in the United States 607,000,000 bushels. There were produced the year before, 1915, 1,011,000,000 bushels of wheat, which shows that the crop of 1916 was 404,000,000 bushels less than the crop of 1915.

I find as to oats that the amount raised last year, 1916, was 1,229,000,000 bushels, while the year before the production was 1,540,000,000 bushels, showing a shortage in the oat crop of last year, as compared with the preceding year, of 311,000,000 bushels.

The barley crop last year amounted to 183,000,000 bushels, and the year before, 1915, to 237,000,000 bushels, showing that the barley crop last year was 54,000,000 bushels less than the barley crop of 1915.

In the case of oats there was a shortage of 8,000,000 bushels last year, as compared with the crop of the year before.

Of buckwheat there were 2,000,000 bushels less produced last year than in the year 1915.

Mr. President, when we find this enormous shortage existing in the year 1916, when we find that the total amount of these crops is so much less than in 1915, you may know that we can not have a great quantity in storage. As a necessary result, if their was not a shortage, it would be gotten out, and in that event the price of wheat and other products would not run so high as the price that now prevails.

We find another thing, Mr. President: We find, in regard to the export of wheat from the United States that last year we exported to the world 173,000,000 bushels. There was an enormous demand made by all the nations at war for wheat last year, and yet but 173,000,000 bushels were exported. Only that amount could be spared by us. It has been stated here, and I have no doubt it is true, that the amount of cereals used annually in the production of whisky and alcoholic liquors is 110,000,000 bushels. In other words, more than half of what was exported as wheat was used in this country at the same time for the manufacture of alcoholic drinks. Now, in view of those figures, can it be possible that we can say that there is not a demand here from the standpoint of war necessity? This cereal, which has been used in the production of intoxicating liquors, should be used and must be used, if we are going to win the war, in the proper feeding of the people, instead of consuming it in the form of drinks?

Mr. President, this is not upon the question as to whether liquor is deleterious or not, and as to what its effect will be upon the soldiers or upon the community in general. Purely from a war standpoint, when we find that the production last year was so much less than the year before, and that the production of wheat this year will be 150,000,000 bushels less, it seems to me that it is nothing but a precaution that is wise that we should stop the use of these cereals in the manufacture of something that is detrimental to the health of the soldiers and deleterious to the health of the people.

It is predicted by the Agricultural Department that the shortage of wheat this year will be 150,000,000 bushels; and yet last year the men who manufactured intoxicating liquors used 110,000,000 bushels of cereals. In view of those figures, I can not see how anyone can say that there is not a necessity arising for the United States Government to conserve these products for the purpose of having that supply necessary for life itself kept either in this country or exported to our allies in Europe.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator states that the department reports a shortage of wheat, which it estimates at 150,000,000 bushels.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is what I understand.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then the Senator proceeds to say that the consumption of cereals in the manufacture of alcoholic beverages last year was 110,000,000 bushels.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It has been so stated.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It must be remembered that that 110,000,000 bushels is not wheat.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Not altogether.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Only 3,000 bushels of wheat. I interject this observation in the interest of accuracy.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, let us take it all in all. I did not read the balance, because I supposed that in wheat there was more than in other things; but take the amount of exports that we made in corn—48,000,000 bushels last year. In the case of oats the amount was 95,000,000 bushels last year.

Mr. REED. Of exports?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Of exports, yes, sir; and in the case of wheat it was 173,000,000 bushels. That was in a year when Europe was screaming for our wheat and for our cereals in every way possible. Adding those three together, they would make about 316,000,000 bushels, and yet here is a proposition of not stopping the manufacture of liquor, in which is consumed 110,000,000 bushels of cereals.

I do not care what way you take it, there was a shortage in all the crops; there was a shortage in the exports; and yet you can see from that what an enormous amount is consumed in the manufacture of alcoholic liquors as compared to the amount which we export. When we consider that last year there was more than a normal demand upon the part of Europe for the shipment of wheat and the shipment of barley and the shipment of rye, whatever else we had to export, you can readily see the necessity for the adoption of this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Colorado has expired.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I have listened with patience, with interest, and I think with profit to-day to all that has been said on this subject by the able Senators who have discussed it; and after hearing all that has been spoken I am convinced that whatever the merits of this question may be this is not the place to raise it.

I have been much impressed by what I understood the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to say, as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, that that committee has been considering this question; that it has before it certain bills, one of which at least will be reported, so that the question is bound to come up again, and that pending that report the matter has been submitted to the Secretary of War and to the Secretary of Agriculture for opinions from them and such expressions as they may care to make concerning the adoption of an amendment of this kind, and how best to work it out. Before I vote upon this question I should like very much indeed to know what the heads of those departments have to say. That would exercise very great influence on my mind in determining just how I should cast my vote.

Mr. President, there is not another Senator on this floor, perhaps, except my own colleague, who approaches this question from the same angle that I do. The State of Indiana, as the Vice President very well knows, has, through its last legislature, enacted a statutory prohibition law. Indiana is to go dry on the 2d day of April next. From that time forth Indiana is to be freed from the evils of the saloon influence, whatever they may be. Mr. President, I do not know just how much money is invested in the liquor business in the State, but in the breweries and distilleries of Indiana there must be not less than $30,000,000 invested, and probably more. The people who have those investments are adjusting their affairs to meet the day prescribed by the last session of the legislature for winding up their business. If, in the view of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of War, it is necessary to curtail the time that has been allotted them for going out of business, I might, and probably would, vote one way on this question. My vote, in other words, would be very largely influenced by the information that might come to me as a result of these inquiries which the Senator from Oklahoma, as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, tells us have been instituted, and answers to which are expected. If the administration and the departments have any recommendations to make, I shall probably follow them, but I would like to know what they are before casting my vote.

I doubt, therefore, as I remarked, that this is the time and place for the consideration of this question.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I am going to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. The constitutionality of it has been challenged by a number of Senators. Within that short time since it was offered I have given it such examination as I could, and I have come to the conclusion that the Congress has the power to legislate upon this subject. In other words, when this Nation is at war I believe that Congress has the power to provide for the conservation of the supply of foodstuffs under the control of the Nation, and to use them for the benefit of the country in supporting and maintaining not only its armies but its inhabitants and its allies.

Under Article I, section 8, paragraph 11, of the Constitution we find that Congress is authorized to declare war. That does not have so much bearing upon the question, but is preliminary to the other paragraphs to which I will refer.

Paragraph 12 provides that Congress has the power to raise and support armies.

Paragraph 13 vests in Congress the power to provide and maintain a navy, and paragraph 15 the power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

Paragraph 18 of the same section of Article I authorizes Congress "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers."

Whatever is necessary, or some of our cases say convenient, to carry into effect and execute any power vested in the Congress by the Constitution may be resorted to by Congress for that purpose. All means that have a natural and reasonable connection with the power vested, according to the language of some of our cases, are within the power of Congress. I can not give a better illustration than the construction that has been given the commerce clause of the Constitution, which is the third paragraph of section 8 of Article I, which ordains that Congress may "regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States."

The Supreme Court of the United States has held that Congress under this clause has the right to control transportation and navigation, and, thirdly, to improve rivers for that purpose. Now, in defining the powers vested by this clause the court has frequently held that the Congress is the sole judge of what is necessary to carry that power vested into effect, by any means convenient or necessary, provided it has a reasonable and natural connection with or relation to the end to be attained or the power vested.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question at that point?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Even if it be conceded that Congress in time of war has the power to enact this amendment, does the Senator think it could put it into operation without compensating those whose property may be taken or whose business may be injured?

Mr. SHIELDS. Generally speaking, when private property is taken for a public purpose compensation must be made. Such is the Constitution, and every clause of the Constitution is to be construed with relation to every other clause.

Now, Mr. President, I think Congress, having the right to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy, to provide for calling forth the militia to enforce the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, has the right to control the food supply of the country when it deems it necessary for those purposes.

I believe that Congress has the right to take charge of the food supply of the country. If it has not, then all the legislation for which there are bills now pending before both Houses to conserve the food supply of this country and regulate its use and its prices is beyond the power of Congress to pass.

I have no time to elaborate these thoughts. I have not heard the necessity of this legislation controverted by anyone except the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. That has been generally conceded. In fact, Mr. President, it is a matter of common opinion or common knowledge throughout the United States that there is a great shortage in the supply of foodstuffs in this country, and various propositions have been made for an embargo upon their exportation, and bills have been introduced in both Houses for that purpose. Any man who knows that flour is now selling for $16 a barrel, that bacon is selling at from 25 to 30 cents a pound, that corn is $2 a bushel, that there are thousands of homes throughout this land where those common articles of food are unknown, knows that there is a shortage. Not only is there a shortage here, but we are now in alliance in the pending war with nations across the ocean that are almost starving and whose representatives are here begging us for food, and we are building a thousand wooden ships to take it to them. These facts indisputably show the necessity of conserving our foodstuffs. While this is the purpose of this legislation, it is fortunate that it also tends to the cause of temperance and the suppression of the manufacture and use of intoxicating beverages.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, as bearing upon the question which is before the Senate for consideration, I take occasion to present and have read at the desk a letter from the Central West Virginia Coal Operators' Association. I will say that the testimony offered by this association comes from a group of business men in my State, and their experience is in line with that of other business associations of similar character throughout the State after nearly two years' experience with prohibition, which has been in operation in our State for almost two years.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE CENTRAL WEST VIRGINIA COAL OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION,
Fairmont, W. Va., May 7, 1917.

Hon. HOWARD SUTHERLAND,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am quoting below a resolution passed at a recent general meeting of this association and will thank you to bring this to the attention of the Congress of the United States at an early date:

"Resolved, That this association, representing a membership of coal operators producing annually more than 15,000,000 tons of coal in the counties of Monongalia, Marion, Harrison, and Taylor, in the State of West Virginia, do request our Members of Congress and United States Senators to use all their influence and every effort to further the cause of national prohibition, in order to conserve the supply of grain and also to promote greater industrial efficiency; and

"Resolved further, That the secretary of this association be, and he is hereby, instructed to forward copies of this resolution to our Members of Congress and United States Senators."

Very truly, yours, D. R. LAWSON, Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. CUMMINS].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to on a division.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On line 6 of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa it is proposed to strike out "intoxicating liquors" and insert "distilled spirits."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I beg the attention of the Senators to a very serious phase of this problem, which I think is entitled to consideration at this time, if we are going to legislate at all on this question.

The amendment of the Senator from Iowa will have this effect: It will close down all the distilleries and all the breweries in the United States, as, of course, it is conceded that if grains and cereals are not permitted to be used in the manufacture of alcoholic beverages it will be impossible to manufacture those beverages, either in the form of distilled spirits or in the form of beers, with very, very few exceptions.

Mr. President, my information is, and it was so testified before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, that there is about a three years' supply of whisky and distilled spirits in the United States, which, under this amendment, can be sold at any time in those portions of the country that are still permitting the sale of alcoholic beverages. Of beers, however, there is not to exceed three months' supply. That is largely because beer, as it is ordinarily brewed and placed upon the market, will not keep for more than three or four or five months. It is safe to say, then, that after the expiration of four or five months, dating from the passage of this act, if it shall be passed, there will be no more beer in the United States. There will be all the whisky that anybody wants, and consequently this amendment, if it is agreed to in this form, will, in my humble judgment, Senators, convert our people into a whisky-drinking people during this war.

The workingman or mechanic who now is satisfied with a glass of beer at the end of his day's work, and who, incidentally, can not understand why anyone should attempt to prevent his having it, for it does him no harm, will be strongly tempted, if this law is placed upon the statute books, to substitute for that glass of beer, which he can no longer get, a stiff drink of whisky, and there is not a Senator upon this floor who does not know that that will injure his efficiency and will cause more trouble and more distress than any other element that you can inject into the social and industrial life of America.

I think any man who employs large numbers of men and who relies upon their good habits and upon their health and their contentment for the successful operation of his business will testify that he has no particular objection to his workingmen being enabled to purchase a glass of beer. What he does dread, and rightfully, is the cultivation of the habit amongst his workingmen for distilled spirits—whisky, gin, brandy, and rum. That is where the trouble always arises.

I have been convinced for many years while this agitation for prohibition has been going on that if we want to cure the evils of drinking in this country—and we certainly do—we can do it better by educating, if possible, the great masses of our people to the advantage of drinking beer and wine and cutting out distilled liquors. It would be a blessing to America if our people could cultivate and establish the habits of the French and Italians in their countries, where wines and beers are the common daily beverage, where men and women of all ages down to little children drink the harmless red wines and light malt beers.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New York his understanding of the meaning of the phrase "distilled spirits." Does it mean anything more than alcohol?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I certainly intended it to mean more than that, but I may have expressed it badly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. My recollection is from my general reading upon the liquor question that the phrase "distilled spirits" would mean alcohol, and that the phrase which the Senator has in mind would be "spirituous liquors"—whisky, brandy, and rum.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If my phrase is inaccurate and misleading, certainly I want to correct it, and if the phrase suggested by the Senator from Delaware is the proper one I will promptly accept it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator from New York will yield——

Mr. WADSWORTH. My time is very limited. I hope the Senator will make his question brief.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I simply want to say I think the phrase "distilled spirits" is correct and is recognized by the internal-revenue laws of the country.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That was my understanding when I wrote the amendment.

But, Mr. President, this is a very serious sociological and industrial problem that we are approaching here this afternoon in a manner which I regard as absurd under a rule limiting debate to 10-minute speeches and without any exhaustive investigation by any committee of the Senate.

I am thoroughly convinced that if the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is adopted we will turn thousands upon thousands of laboring men in the United States into whisky drinkers. I do not need to remind Senators upon this floor that there are mighty few crimes of violence in the United States but that whisky is at the back of them.

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. CALDER. Has my colleague taken into consideration the immense rise in the value of whisky which will take place if the amendment is agreed to?

Mr. WADSWORTH. This amendment will make the fortunes of distillers. They will have an absolute monopoly of all alcoholic beverages with the exception of wine.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The clientele of the Senator from California will have the monopoly in wine.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I so understand, but that is not the point I am driving at.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can not yield to the Senator. I hope the Senator will not misunderstand me.

My amendment limits the prohibition of the use of cereals and grain to the manufacture of distilled spirits. I mean by that hard liquors—whisky, rum, gin, and brandy.

By that same amendment the brewing of beer would still be permitted. We would save the grain which is used in the manufacture of hard liquor, and that, of course, is in line with the conservation of the food supply. In my judgment it is well worth our while to permit the use of grain in the manufacture of beers while this war is going on, for if we do not nothing will be left to drink but whisky, and that will go far toward demoralizing the great labor centers of the country.

There is another element in this situation which, if we are to legislate in a statesmanlike spirit in the face of this great war, we should take into consideration, and that is the element of public contentment. We in effect to-day are asking the workingmen of this country, the mechanics and the laborers in the great steel plants, in the munition factories, in the coal mines, to work their hardest, if necessary to work overtime, for their country. We are placing an additional burden of work upon them. We expect that they will perform that additional burden cheerfully; and cheerfulness is an element of tremendous importance while this war is being waged. Yet in the very same breath that we are asking these men to work overtime, to work to the limit of their endurance, it may be, we say to them, "You shall not have a glass of beer." Now, whether we think a glass of beer is an injurious thing to the workingman or not, it is not the sole question that confronts us. Thousands of them want it and can see no harm in it. They will resent the action of the Government in taking it away. Let us control it and gradually reduce it, if necessary, but let us take care that we do not create discontent or make this war unpopular.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, more than once it has been suggested that we ought not to consider an amendment of this sort under the rule which is now governing the debate. We are now limited to speeches of 10 minutes. But I want the Senator from New York and all other Senators to remember that this amendment was before the Senate at the time the unanimous-consent agreement was proposed, and if any Senator believed that we could not consider such a question very well under the restrictions proposed he ought to have objected to the unanimous-consent agreement. This amendment was proposed before the Judiciary Committee, and was presented immediately after the bill itself was reported, and has been lying printed throughout the debate upon the desks of Senators for two weeks or more. I think, therefore, that the objection first made by the Senator from New York is not sound or tenable.

With regard to the second objection, no one pretends that this measure cures all the evils that are involved in the liquor traffic. I have sedulously attempted to eliminate the prohibition feature from it, and, at the suggestion of several Senators, I consented that the words "other edible things" might be eliminated in order that it could not be said that we were using this emergency in order to advance the cause of prohibition, no matter how devotedly I am attached to that cause.

The sole question here is whether it is better that the people who are working in the munition plants and other industrial centers of the country should have beer or bread. The Senator from New York apparently thinks that if they must work without one or the other they should work without bread and should have beer. I do not question his conclusion that, if we must choose in organizing the habits of the people of America between hard liquor and the lighter drinks, we should use the latter—I have no doubt of that—but this is not intended to regulate the habits of the American people. It is intended to make it reasonably sure that this year and next year and during the war they will have something to eat.

Mr. President, if we have 300,000,000 gallons of whisky on hand, and the use of that whisky will destroy the efficiency or corrupt the morals and manners of the people of this country, as I am sure it will, it is not difficult to have it destroyed; it is not difficult to prevent the people of this country under the war power as now urged from having access to the 300,000,000 gallons of whisky. I have no doubt that some one having that end in view will bring forward a measure that will prevent the accumulation of these spirits having the effect upon the people of the country predicted by the Senator from New York. I can not deal with the subject here. We are simply attempting to conserve the food supply. In some other measure I hope we will be able to deal with the accumulated liquor of the country.

I for one do not believe the workers of America are so insistent upon their glass of beer at night. Some of them are, of course, unfortunately so; but, I believe, looked at from the economic as well as the social standpoint, America would be vastly better off if there was not a single drink of intoxicating liquor anywhere within our borders during that time, confining myself, of course, to the war; but I would make the same assertions as far as peace is concerned. I have no fear of converting the men and women of America into whisky drinkers beyond the stage at which they have already arrived.

Mr. REED. Would the Senator, then, be willing to accept an amendment prohibiting absolutely the sale of intoxicating liquors of any kind during the war?

Mr. CUMMINS. I would. I would not accept the amendment because I do not want to destroy what I am trying to do—namely, to preserve the food for the country—but as an independent measure I would vote for such a proposal at any time, and I would vote for it in time of peace as well as war.

Mr. REED. I am asking the Senator if he would not accept that amendment to his amendment so that it would meet the objection of the Senator from New York?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I can not yield to the Senator for an argument——

Mr. REED. Oh, no; I am not arguing; I am asking the Senator——

Mr. CUMMINS. Frame the question, then, please.

Mr. REED. I ask the Senator if he would not, in order to meet the objection of the Senator from New York and also to reach all these moral phases of the question, accept an amendment making it illegal to sell or drink intoxicating liquors of any kind?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I will not accept an amendment of that character, because I do not intend to imperil the adoption of this amendment. If I were sure that an amendment of that kind proposed by the Senator from Missouri would have the same happy fate that attended another amendment which he proposed at a previous time I would have no hesitation about accepting it, but I am not convinced that it would have that result, and therefore I would not accept it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the proponent of this amendment, the Senator from Iowa, has just stated it is not a prohibition measure, and I take it that he has correctly stated its status; that it is an economic question involved and not a prohibition question involved; that it is really proposed as a question of conserving the food supply of America. I think that is manifestly true, because it is apparent, to begin with, that this amendment can not affect conditions in prohibition States. If there is any liquor sold in prohibition States, it is hard liquor. There is an ample supply of whiskies and brandies in this country to outlast the war, and there is certainly no beer sold within the prohibition States, or a very small quantity of it.

In the States that are not prohibition it seems to me manifest that no severer blow could be proposed to the cause of prohibition than for the advocates of prohibition to pass a law that would drive the people of those States who desire to drink at all to the drinking of whiskies and brandies instead of beer or light malt liquors. The resultant effect of the sentiment, in my judgment, if the nonprohibition States had to face this law if it goes on the statute books, would be against the cause of prohibition and not in favor of it. Therefore I will not argue the question from that standpoint at all.

But, looking at it entirely from the standpoint of the Senator from Iowa, as he presents his case—and that is that this is an economic question, intended to conserve the food supply of the country—I do not believe it will accomplish that result. I have in mind an illustration that is somewhat in point. Cotton seed is used to make oil, and after the oil is crushed out of the seed it is used to feed cattle. I have seen reports in which it has been stated that after you crush the oil out of the cotton seed its food value is nearly as great as it was before you removed the oil, and that by feeding the cotton seed directly to cattle without removing the oil you are making an economic mistake. The same thing is true in reference to corn and grain that is used to make either distilled spirits or malt liquors. Everyone knows that the mash, I think they call it, that comes out of the distillery or the brewery after the alcohol has been extracted is used for the purpose of feeding cattle; and there are vast numbers of cattle that are fed in this country on the mash from breweries.

Now, what is the result? We are in need of cattle for food equally as well as grain for bread. When you stop the use of corn and grain to make malt liquors or distilled liquors out of it you have to carry the cattle that are now fed in that way to the fields and to the barns, and you have got to feed them on grain, to a large extent, or you have got to carry those cattle to the slaughterhouse.

Mr. OVERMAN. And hogs.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And hogs, to a large extent, as suggested by the Senator from North Carolina. So in the end the actual saving and conservation of a food supply, should this amendment be adopted, in my judgment, will be very small. It will be the minimum. On the other hand, you will destroy the present business of feeding cattle. You will interfere and draw on the food supply of other men who are feeding cattle to-day and disrupt the economic conditions of producing food for the people of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have only a moment, but I will yield for a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just for a statement, and then a question. Those who claim to know say that 70 per cent of the food value of grain is lost in the conversion mentioned by the Senator from Alabama. The cattle or hogs get the benefit of 30 per cent—only one-third—of the amount of grain fed the cattle or hogs.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Can the Senator refer me to an official statement of that fact?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would be glad to have it, because, as I stated in the beginning, I have not an official statement, but I know there are official statements in reference to the pressing of cotton seed, and the results of those statements is to the contrary.

I have no doubt that in the brain of some one who desires this legislation passed for some other motive the idea may have been conceived that 70 per cent of the food value is lost. I am not informed; and without direct information from some one who has tested the matter, some governmental or other authority that can be relied on, I would not credit that statement; I would not believe it, because I do not think the facts justify it.

In the first place, we all know, without any scientific inquiry, that alcohol is not a producer of fat; that it is the starch in the grain that produces fat. You might feed the human being or the cattle on alcohol forever, and you would not produce fat, though you might produce a bloated condition. It is the fats that we need to sustain human life. We know, without being informed scientifically, that it is the starch in the grain that produces fat, and it is the starch in the grain that is left after distillation that goes to the cattle for that purpose. Therefore, without intending in any way to reflect on the authority of the Senator from Iowa, I discredit entirely the statement he has made in reference to the large percentage of food value being taken away from this grain when it is distilled. I believe that a scientific inquiry would disclose the fact that there is very little of food value that is removed from the grain when you distill it and take out the alcohol.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield for a question. I have only 10 minutes in which to speak, and I hope the Senator from North Dakota will not occupy much of that time.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply wish to emphasize what the Senator from Iowa has just stated. The distillers of the country were before the Agricultural Committee; they have been before the committee during the last week; and they admitted that there was from 30 to 33⅓ per cent of the food value of the grain left after it had been distilled.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the Senator from Iowa stated that it was 70 per cent.

Mr. CUMMINS. I said that there was 30 per cent left.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood the Senator to say that there was 70 per cent taken out. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; there is 70 per cent taken out, and 30 per cent left.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I misunderstood both Senators, and I beg their pardon.

Of course, I can realize that there is a greater proportion of food value taken out in the manufacture of malt liquor than there is in the manufacture of distilled spirits, because they are manufactured in a different way. A part of the food value goes into the malt liquor, while none of the food value goes into the distilled spirits; but I still think that the estimate is a large one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] undoubtedly has pointed to a very bad result which may come from the enactment of this proposed statute in its present form. We know—and there is no use in our sitting here and trying to fool ourselves—that if you were to eliminate the prohibition sentiment that is here present in the Senate not a single moment's consideration would be given to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa at this time. We would set it aside and take it up as a separate bill or take it up in connection with some bill that had to do with the conservation of food products. We all know that the reason the attempt is being made to hang the proposition onto this bill is, if possible, to gain that much ground at this time for prohibition. Nobody need fool himself about that. There is no use in people standing here and protesting to the contrary; that is the fact. If it were not the fact, then Senators would all be perfectly willing to wait until the agricultural bill came in. They would be unwilling to delay the passage of this bill at this time, but would allow the bill to go through and to become a law, and then take up this separate subject at a different time.

Mr. President, I call attention to this in connection with what the Senator from New York has said. The Senator from New York charged you with the information that if this bill is passed there will be a destruction of the manufacture of beer, but there will be a large amount of distilled liquors—hard liquors, we commonly call them—left in the community. I call attention to the fact that under this bill hard liquors would be manufactured without limit. The only difference is that instead of making them out of grain, which may produce a liquor that is not absolutely a poison, you have closed that door; but you propose under this bill, as now amended, to allow the manufacture of any kind of fruits into liquors; in other words, there would be manufactured an unlimited supply of brandy. Every grape in the country, every apple in the country, every pear and peach and every berry of every kind in the country can be manufactured into brandy of one kind or another.

Mr. President, that is not the kind of way to promote temperance; that is not the kind of temperance bill to pass. If you propose in this bill to simply conserve the grains of the country, then let us take that up as a separate proposition and get the facts. We do not know what the facts are to-day. I am informed that the testimony before the Agricultural Committee was to the effect that there were only about 88,000,000 bushels of grain employed in the manufacture of liquor. I am informed that the evidence showed that there was almost no wheat whatever used in the manufacture of liquor; that the wheat so used was a negligible quantity.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REED. In just one moment. I am informed that the greater part of the grain used is barley, a grain that is not much used in this country for food. I am informed that there is a large salvage from this grain in the shape of food products for animals. So a very different question is presented than was indicated by the remarks of the Senator from Iowa.

All that I am asking is that we shall proceed here in a way so that we may know what we are doing; that we shall have regard for the Constitution; and that we shall not in a haphazard and hasty way rush on here and enact a statute simply because somebody wants to hang a prohibition amendment onto this war measure. If we are going to pass on the prohibition amendment in connection with the war, let us do it in a measure that has been duly considered. I promised to yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Did I understand the Senator to say that his information was that there were 8,000,000 bushels of grain employed in the manufacture of liquor?

Mr. REED. No; I said 88,000,000 bushels.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I desire to state, merely in the interest of accuracy, that the testimony before the Committee on Agriculture was that 58,000,000 bushels of barley and about 15,000,000 bushels of corn were used for this purpose, and that the balance was made up of wheat, rye, and rice.

Mr. REED. But the Senator from North Dakota ought to say, in the interest of accuracy, that that evidence shows that the amount of wheat used was practically negligible.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply wanted to substantiate what the Senator from Missouri said.

Mr. POMERENE. It was about 3,000 bushels.

Mr. REED. About 3,000 bushels. What I complain about is the attempt to push a matter through in this way. I am willing to take up the question of the conservation of our grain, but I want to take it up in orderly course, and not under a 10-minute debate. I want to take it up when we can get the evidence which has been given before the Agricultural Committee and digest it and understand it; I want to take it up when we can have the report of the Secretary of Agriculture and digest it and understand it; I want to take it up under circumstances where we may know what we are doing, where we can take the Constitution into consideration, and have some time to examine that. There is no necessity for tying this amendment on at this time; but if it is to go on, then I insist that it shall be a real prohibition amendment. If the amendment of the Senator from New York is voted down I shall then offer an amendment to make this a real prohibition amendment.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I should like the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I have made a very hasty examination in an effort to ascertain the exact meaning of the phrase "distilled spirits" used by him in his amendment, and from that hasty examination I am convinced in my mind that the phrase does not mean what the Senator from New York intends by it.

It is very true, as has been pointed out by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], that the phrase "distilled spirits" as used in the internal-revenue law does embrace brandies, whiskies, rum, and gin; but that, Mr. President, is because of the fact that the internal-revenue law itself defines the phrase. Section 3247 of the United States Compiled Satutes, 1901, defines first "distiller" in the following language:

> Every person who produces distilled spirits, or who brews or makes mash, wort, or wash fit for distillation or for the production of spirits, or who, by any process of evaporization, separates alcoholic spirit from any fermented substance, or who, making or keeping mash, wort, or wash, has also in his possession or use a still, shall be regarded as a distiller.

The next section, being section 3248, proceeds to define distilled spirits, and employs this language:

> Distilled spirits, spirits, alcohol, and alcoholic spirit, within the true intent and meaning of this act, is that substance known as ethyl alcohol, hydrated oxide of ethyl, or spirit of wine, which is commonly produced by the fermentation of grain, starch, molasses, or sugar including all dilutions and mixtures of this substance; and the tax shall attach to this substance as soon as it is in existence as such, whether it be subsequently separated as pure or impure spirit, or be immediately, or at any subsequent time, transferred into any other substance, either in the process of original production or by any subsequent process.

Now, I think, inasmuch as the statute thus specifically defines "distilled spirits," that it is not safe in ascertaining the meaning of the phrase to follow its meaning as it is given by the United States courts in administering the internal-revenue law. I am sure the Senator from New York wants to keep his language well within the scope of his meaning, and does not want, if this amendment be adopted, to have it come out of the courts in such shape that the phrase "distilled spirits" will be interpreted into the word "alcohol." I am sure he does not want that. So I suggest that, in order to be safe, he employ the phrase, "spirituous liquor," which has a well-defined meaning.

The expression "distilled spirits" is not confined within the meaning of the internal-revenue act to alcohol; but I think that if there were an opportunity to search the authorities which do not undertake to construe the internal-revenue act, it would be found that certainly in a considerable number of courts the phrase "distilled spirits" is held to mean alcohol, there being in those jurisdictions no statutory definition of the term. But I am convinced also that if the term "spirituous liquors" be used, it will certainly, safely, and squarely cover the ground that the Senator from New York is endeavoring to cover. The definition in the Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure of the phrase "spirituous liquors" is this:

> The latter term—
> That is, spirituous liquors—
> The latter term is properly restricted to such liquors as are produced by the process of distillation, and does not include wine, ale, beer, or other liquors which are not the product of the still, unless the terms of a statute extend its signification so as to make the term cover liquors which are not etymologically within the meaning.

I call this matter to the attention of the Senator from New York, so that if he feels that the suggestion is sound he may change his amendment so as to conform with what I think he has in mind.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Delaware.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York as modified to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is a quorum here.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; there is not. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	McLean	Shields
Beckham	Harding	Martin	Smith, Ga.
Brady	Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Hollis	New	Smoot
Broussard	Husting	Norris	Sutherland

Fernald	Kenyon	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Fletcher	King	Ransdell	Walsh
France	Kirby	Reed	Warren
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Robinson	Wolcott
Gallinger	Lewis	Shafroth
Gerry	McKellar	Sheppard

Mr. WOLCOTT. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], is necessarily absent from the Chamber on business. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon the amendment of the Senator from New York, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, before the roll is called I desire to ask what the amendment is. I have been detained on committee work and was not here when it was offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The original amendment reads:

On and after September 1, 1917, and during the period of the war with the Imperial Government of Germany, it shall be unlawful to use or employ, directly or indirectly, any cereal, grain, sugar, or sirup in the production of intoxicating liquors.

The Senator from New York proposes to strike out the words "intoxicating liquors," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "spirituous liquors."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, just a word before the vote is taken. I have not been present during the discussion because of my detention elsewhere.

I approve the principle of this amendment, but I observe in it no provision whereby the institutions which have procured large quantities, as they doubtless have, of material for the manufacture of spirituous liquors are protected. I believe in the principle of compensation. I do not believe that it is within our power to make a general inhibition, even in war times, without the recognition and provision of means for the enforcement of the principle of compensation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, let me remind the Senator from Colorado, in view of the fact that this amendment does not take effect until the 1st of September, that if these concerns have accumulated any grain or cereal and have it on hand they can sell it for bread.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, they might, and probably could, if conditions remain as they are now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been requested and ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence I am compelled to withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], and therefore withold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when Mr. SAULSBURY'S name was called). I desire to repeat the announcement made a while ago concerning the absence of the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and to state, in addition, that he is paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair I withhold my vote.

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. COLT. Has the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. COLT. In the absence of that Senator I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [McCUMBER] to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—31.

Bankhead	Gerry	Lewis	Reed
Brandegee	Harding	Lodge	Robinson
Broussard	Hardwick	McLean	Stone
Calder	Husting	Nelson	Underwood
Culberson	James	New	Wadsworth

Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Ransdell

NAYS—42.

Ashurst	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Sutherland
Beckham	Kendrick	Poindexter	Swanson
Brady	Kenyon	Shafroth	Thomas
Chamberlain	King	Sheppard	Thompson
Cummins	Kirby	Sherman	Townsend
Curtis	McKellar	Shields	Trammell
Gallinger	Martin	Simmons	Vardaman
Gore	Myers	Smith, Ga.	Walsh

NOT VOTING—23.

Borah	Hitchcock	McCumber	Smith, Md.
Colt	Hughes	Newlands	Smith, Mich.
Dillingham	Johnson, S. D.	Owen	Tillman
Fall	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Watson
Fernald	Knox	Saulsbury	Williams
Goff	Lane	Smith, Ariz.

So Mr. WADSWORTH'S amendment to the amendment of Mr. CUMMINS was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Iowa by adding, after the word "kind," in the seventh line, the words "or to sell as a beverage intoxicating liquors of any kind."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment, as it would read if this amendment were agreed to, be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "kind," it is proposed to insert the words "or to sell as a beverage intoxicating liquors of any kind," so that, if amended, the amendment would read:

On and after September 1, 1917, and during the period of the war with the Imperial Government of Germany, it shall be unlawful to use or employ, directly or indirectly, any cereal, grain, sugar, or sirup in the production of intoxicating liquors in any form, or of any kind, or to sell as a beverage intoxicating liquors of any kind: Provided, however, That this section shall not be construed—

And so forth.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to this condition of affairs that would arise were his amendment to be adopted? The amendment of the Senator from Iowa does not prohibit the manufacture of wine.

Mr. REED. I understand that it does not, and I understand that the manufacture of wine is just as wicked and the manufacture of brandy is just as villainous as the manufacture of beer and Bourbon whisky; that there is no more sense in destroying good grapes and good apples and good peaches in a time of food shortage than there is in destroying grain.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I do not intend to delay the vote, but I submit that grapes are not a food to be conserved, whereas grain possibly is.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri has spoken once.

Mr. REED. I desire to say a word in regard to this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has spoken on his amendment.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; I answered a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Well, the Senator has spoken on the amendment.

Mr. REED. The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] rose and asked me a question. I answered in the time of the Senator from New York. Surely the Vice President is in error; that is all. The Senator from New York had the floor, and not I. The Senator from New York has used up his time to speak.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no way to prevent the Senator from Missouri from talking when he wants to. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Not when the Senator is within his rights.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Or out of them.

Mr. REED. The Vice President's mind, I think, was on some other matter when this little occurrence happened.

Mr. President, I offer this amendment, as I offered one on a former occasion, in good faith. If we have the right to adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], we have the right to adopt this amendment. If it is right to stop the manufacture of grains into whisky and into beer, it is right to stop the waste of fruits in the manufacture of wines and of brandies. If it is right to enact these laws in the interest of the health of our soldiers, and if it is desirable to enact them to the end that our fighting men may be sober and the people at home may be sober, then I protest that it is equally right to insist that they shall not become drunken upon brandy or wine. If we enact these laws in the interest of the preservation of food products, then I say that it is almost as essential to prevent the destruction of apples and of peaches and of grapes as it is to prevent the destruction of barley—a thing that is used only to a slight extent in this country for food.

If it is desired now that this war shall be waged by a sober Nation—that the evils due to the use of intoxicants shall be suspended and cut off during this great conflict—if the arguments that have been made here by gentlemen who are advocates of prohibition are sound arguments, then this is the time and this is the occasion to carry them into effect, and not to adopt a miserable subterfuge that will permit everybody in the country to get drunk on wine or to become intoxicated upon brandy. Let us, if we are going to have prohibition in this country, have it. Let us have its blessings. Let us make it so that there will be no drunkenness and no destruction of food products.

Mr. President, if the constitutional authority exists for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, then the constitutional authority indubitably exists for the amendment I have offered; and I am curious to know how many men there are now who really are willing to cut off grog and cut it off completely.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator from Missouri a question? He can answer it in my time. I should like to ask the Senator if he considers his amendment to be constitutional?

Mr. REED. Undoubtedly, if the main amendment is constitutional. I am offering it to the amendment. I say it stands on an exact parity with the amendment, and I am dealing with that question now. If that amendment be constitutional this amendment to the amendment is constitutional.

Mr. KENYON. If the Senator's amendment will bring about national prohibition during the war I shall be glad to see it adopted. I am inclined to think that it is constitutional and shall vote for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when the Greeks come bearing gifts it is a good idea to beware of them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays are requested on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and withhold my vote.

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], and I therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote I would vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). In the absence of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], with whom I am paired, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my transfer as on the last vote and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Making the same transfer of my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] as heretofore, I vote "yea."

Mr. HUSTING. I wish to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 47, as follows:

YEAS—25.

Ashurst	Jones, Wash.	Myers	Sutherland
Beckham	Kendrick	Poindexter	Thompson
Brady	Kenyon	Reed	Trammell

Goff	Lane	Smith, Ariz.	Williams

So Mr. REED's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEEKS. I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add the following proviso:

Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to the manufacture of rum used exclusively in the preparation of tobacco for the market.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not pretend to be an expert in the curing of tobacco, but I am informed that practically all the rum that is produced in this country is produced from molasses brought from Santa Cruz and other West Indian Islands, and that that rum is used in the curing of tobacco, not only plug tobacco, but tobacco used for cigars and other purposes. It does not seem to me that it comes within the intent or the spirit of this legislation, and therefore I think the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not know just how much rum is used in curing tobacco. I have always been led to believe that a small quantity of it is used in certain forms of chewing or plug tobacco, but not in other forms of tobacco. However that may be, the manufacturers of tobacco will have no difficulty in importing enough rum to supply their needs in the manufacture of tobacco. What I am trying to do is to preserve the food supply, and I do not want any of the sugar or molasses or sirup that we have in this country which can be used for food converted into rum, even though it may be very desirable in the production of some forms of tobacco. Everybody knows that these manufacturers will have access to enough rum to use in their factories for the next year.

Mr. WEEKS. Before the Senator takes his seat, I should like to ask him if he knows where the molasses comes from that is used in the manufacture of rum in this country?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Massachusetts stated in his remarks a moment ago where it came from. I did not dispute him, and it may be inferred that I accepted his statement.

Mr. WEEKS. Therefore I conclude that we are not using molasses or any similar product that is produced in this country for making rum to any considerable extent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that it be once more stated by the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to the manufacture of rum used exclusively in the preparation of tobacco for the market.

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon the amendment to the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair as before and withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair as on the last two votes and vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 37, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—37.

Bankhead	James	New	Thomas
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Underwood
Broussard	Jones, N. Mex.	Pomerene	Wadsworth

Fernald	Knox	Saulsbury	Williams

So Mr. WEEKS's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STONE. I propose the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The Secretary will report the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "kind," before the first proviso, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall prevent the use of sugar or sirup in the manufacture of wine as now authorized by existing law.

And also to strike out the words "Provided, however," in line 7, and in lieu thereof to insert the words "Provided further," so that the section will read:

That on and after September 1, 1917, and during the period of the war with the Imperial Government of Germany it shall be unlawful to use or employ, directly or indirectly, any cereal, grain, sugar, or sirup in the production of intoxicating liquor in any form or of any kind: Provided, That nothing in this section shall prevent the use of sugar or sirup in the manufacture of wine as now authorized by existing law: Provided further, That this section shall not be construed—

And so forth.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask the attention of Senators for a few moments, that I may endeavor to make plain what is intended by this amendment. The prohibition question is in no sense involved in the amendment. I wish to make that statement emphatic and to have it understood.

The Senate has just voted upon an amendment to include wine in the provisions of this section proposed by the Senator from Iowa, and voted it down. So wine, in any event, will continue to be manufactured.

Mr. President, for 20 years or more there has been a struggle going on between the manufacturers of wine in California and the manufacturers of wine in the States east of the Rocky Mountains. This latter class embraces a number of States. The contest grew out of this state of facts: In California, by reason of climate and soil conditions, grapes produced there contain a sufficient quantity of saccharine to enable the California wine makers to dispense with the use of artificial amelioration. I mean the addition of sugar. On the contrary, the manufacturers of wine in California are required to add acid to their wine instead of sugar. The very reverse of that is true in the Middle Western and Eastern States. The grapes produced in those States do not ordinarily possess an adequate amount of saccharine matter to enable the wine producers in those States to make a commercial wine without the addition of sugar and water.

That old contest—I have not the time at my disposal to enable me to go into the details of it and to make it understood by those who are not familiar with it, but it is an old struggle—was fought out here for years and years in Congress. At the last Congress we passed a bill, after a heated contest, providing, as a sort of compromise between the California grape growers and wine makers and the grape growers and wine makers of the balance of the country, that a certain amount of sugar might be used in our middle western and eastern wines, to ameliorate them so as to make them merchantable. That was agreed upon and it was passed here into law.

Senators, if this provision that no sugar shall be used in the manufacture of any kind of alcoholic drinks is adopted, then the wine manufacturers of every State this side of the Rocky Mountains will be put out of business, because it will nullify the very law of which I have spoken, which we passed here as a matter of compromise between the parties in this contest, and it would give, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] suggests to me, an absolute monopoly to California in wine production in the United States.

The percentage of sugar used in the manufacture of wines in the Middle Western and Eastern States is but a small percentage of the aggregate production. I am not able at this moment to state—because the thing has come up here in such a way that I have not had an opportunity to try to ascertain it, if it is possible to do so—but it is bound to be an infinitesimal percentage of the total.

I think, Senators, you do not want to overturn what we did here after long years of struggle. I say "we did," but I should say, what the Congress of the United States did after long years of patient investigation and discussion of this question and settled it.

Now, here, in the pressure of this moment, in the circumstances of this time, this proposition is injected by the Senator from California as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. So if you include sugar and sirup, without the qualifying amendment which I have offered, then you wipe out the grape-growing and wine-making industry of every State outside of California. Do you want to do that? I hope you do not.

What I have offered as a proviso is that nothing in this section shall prevent the use of sugar or sirup as now provided by law for the amelioration of wine, and that is all there is to it.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, there is no necessity for any heat in a discussion of this kind, for earlier in the day I took occasion to state that there is no intention whatever on my part to bar the wines of Missouri and of Ohio from the benefits of this act. I am opposed to monopoly—even to a California monopoly—and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment is therefore entirely agreeable to me. I believe it should be adopted because it removes a suspicion which hovers over the amendment of the Senator from Iowa in that respect. There is no intention on the part of anybody to discriminate against the wines of Missouri and Ohio.

It is an error to state that acid is added to California wine. It naturally matures.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] that this is quite an old question. The truth is that California makes a wine grape, and very few parts of the remainder of the United States do; and that, in order to make something that may be sold as wine, those outside of California have to put a whole lot of sugar in their product; but I agree with the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] that that question ought not to present itself just now. I shall, therefore, vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, partially for that reason and partially because the matter was settled by compromise when we drew up the last revenue bill.

Now, I want to go back to the main amendment, which is the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I am about as little of a fanatic upon the liquor question, I suppose, as anybody in the world. I have never pretended to be a saint in the way of abstinence, or to be a very strong and strenuous prohibitionist, except in so far as Mississippi has instructed me by her action, which I consider myself in honor bound to obey and sincerely to represent; but I do think, Mr. President, that while the whole world is in a conflict unprecedented in the history of the world—for absolutely there has been nothing like it in the history of recorded events, and nothing like it in prophecy, except the prophecy of Armageddon—that now when speculators are driving up the prices of foodstuffs every day, when the real and genuine demand is making them go up, and when the paucity of the supply is also making the prices go up, owing to the fact that some 12,000,000 men are now under arms, many of whom were producers of foodstuffs, it is madness to be wasting anything that can feed man or beast merely to make something to drink, which, after all, is a luxury—a very stimulating luxury and a very welcome one now and then, but after all a luxury, and without which a man of any degree of stamina and courage when actuated by the proper patriotism can very well afford to do.

That is not all, Mr. President. We want to help our allies across the sea; and if anything in the world will have an effect right now upon the price of corn and wheat and barley and rice in the way of making them go down in price or else in the way of making them cease to go up in price so rapidly as they are now going, it would be the announcement of the fact that they can not be used for these purposes.

One more thing, and I shall have finished. If there is anybody who thinks that mankind is going to suffer for whisky or rum or anything else of that sort during the war period, he is mistaken. The number of barrels of whisky piled up in bond to-day would carry the American people through their drinking habits if this war lasted four more years without even rationing them—putting them upon short rations—as they do put human beings upon short rations in Europe with regard to things very much more essential; in fact, with regard to things absolutely necessary for human existence—bread and meat.

Now, it does seem to me that we ought to rise to the occasion regardless of our view upon the liquor question and say that during this war nothing that is fit for food for man or beast, to help win the war, shall go into intoxicating liquors except so much of it as may be absolutely necessary, perhaps, to manufacture neutral alcohol for the arts, and I think none will be necessary, because it can be manufactured from distilled alcoholic liquors already in existence.

Mr. President, it seems to me that we owe that to our population; we owe it to the population of France and of Great Britain and of the world; we owe it to the cause as it is now. There is no sacrifice about it that is worth anything particularly; and if there were we still ought to make it. Therefore I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, my sole purpose in bringing forward this amendment was to preserve the food supply of the country, to prevent its waste by being used in the manufacture of intoxicants. I consented to the change suggested by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] because it was represented to me—and I could recognize the force of the representation—that it was impossible to preserve the fruits of the country; and to insist that they should be included in the prohibition would indicate that I was endeavoring to advance the cause of prohibition instead of endeavoring to preserve the food we have for the sustenance of our people and of the people across the sea. But I can recognize the force of the argument made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I understand that situation, because we have fought it out here in times past, so that every Member knows the relation between the wine-producing districts of the western and eastern parts of the country and of California.

The amount of sugar that will be consumed in the production of wine in the western and eastern parts of the country is so small that it is practically negligible from the standpoint I am now occupying, and I do not intend to oppose the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator of Missouri to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like the attention of the Senator from Iowa, the author of the amendment, for a moment to ask him a question. I notice in the first two lines of the amendment the following:

That on and after September 1, 1917, and during the period of the war with the Imperial Government of Germany—

I suggest that the word "and" be stricken out. It would seem as though there were two impressions conveyed. If the words "during the war with Germany" were not in it, the act would be a permanent act; and it seems to me that by using the word "and" the same impression might be created.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator read it as it would be if the word "and" were stricken out?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It would then read:

That on and after September 1, 1917, during the period of the war with the Imperial Government of Germany—

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have no objection to that at all.

While I am on my feet I want to insert the word "industrial" after the word "mechanical." I do it at the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. It is thought that the word "mechanical" might not cover the use of alcohol or spirits in the manufacture of powder, munitions, and the like; and I do not want any possibility of that interpretation. I think the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] also suggested that amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, because the question is very likely often to arise in the immediate future, as well as in connection with this particular bill under consideration, I send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read section 715 in the second volume of Willoughby on the Constitution, which expresses in general terms the power of Congress under the war authority. I commend it particularly to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] in connection with the case of ex parte Milligan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The constitutional power given to the United States to declare and wage war, whether foreign or civil, carries with it the authority to use all means calculated to weaken the enemy and to bring the struggle to a successful conclusion. When dealing with the enemy all acts that are calculated to advance this end are legal. Indeed, the President in the exercise simply of his authority as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, may, unless prohibited by congressional statute, commit or authorize acts not warranted by commonly received principles of international law; and Congress may by law authorize measures which the courts must recognize as valid, even though they provide penalties not supported by the general usage of nations in the conduct of war. Thus during the Civil War in certain cases the provision by congressional statute for the confiscation of certain enemy property or land was enforced, though such confiscation was not in accordance with the general usage of foreign States.

Even in dealing with its own loyal subjects, the power to wage war enables the Government to override in many particulars private rights which in time of peace are inviolable.

The power to wage war carries with it the authority not only to bring it to a full conclusion but, after the cessation of active military operations, to take measures to provide against its renewal. As the court says in Stewart v. Kahn: "The measures to be taken in carrying on war and to suppress insurrection are not defined. The decision of all such questions rests wholly in the discretion of those to whom the substantial powers involved are confided by the Constitution. In the latter case the power is not limited to victories in the field and to the dispersion of the insurgent forces. It carries with it inherently the power to guard against the immediate renewal of the conflict, and to remedy the evils which have arisen from its rise and progress."

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, there is one matter that I want especially to lay before the Senator from Iowa and generally before the Senate.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] a few moments ago stated a fact—at least, I agree with him in believing it to be a fact—which is of special significance at this time, namely, that the distillery warehouses now have piled up a supply of whisky sufficient to carry their trade for two or three years; and I am told that there is not a whisky distiller in the United States who objects to this kind of legislation. Why do not they object? They do not object because this kind of legislation would close the door against all competition with them and afford them an opportunity to bull the market and put up prices on their stored products. You are simply about to legislate millions into the pockets of these men. After the war, and after they have worked off their stored surplus, they will open their distilleries again, as they can do under this bill. You are playing into their hands.

Now, I want to speak about the manufacturers of beer, and on this I ask the attention of Senators. I want you to work your brains a little bit and say to yourselves whether the thing I am going to say to you is worth thinking about.

A lawyer of prominence in St. Louis, who represents a brewery, sent me a document which I have in my hand. I can not personally vouch for the accuracy of the figures in this document. He does vouch for them. He says that they are taken from the official reports of the United States, and in the manufacture of beer this document says the amount of grain used is as follows:

Wheat, none.
Oats, none.
Rye, none.
Barley, bushels, 52,439,000.
Corn products, bushels, 15,711,000.
Rice, bushels, 2,354,000.

And that is all that is used in the manufacture of beer, according to this statement, the accuracy of which is vouched for by one of the most prominent and respectable lawyers and citizens of St. Louis. I do not vouch for the figures, for I have had no time to verify them. But they are vouched for as being officially correct by a man of high character, as I have stated. Will anyone here contradict the accuracy of this statement?

Now, what is the meaning, the significance of this? It means that of the entire grain product of the United States, only three-fourths of 1 per cent, according to this statement, is used in the manufacture of beer, and that consists altogether of barley, corn, and rice, and the amount of corn and rice so used is negligible.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. STONE. I would like to, if I do not——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I merely wanted to suggest that one-third of that goes back again into the food product of the country by being fed to cattle.

Mr. STONE. I know that, and took that into account. I have not time to go into the details. Counting in what goes back as cattle feed, the total consumption, or what some of you call food waste because used in the manufacture of beer, would be only three-fourths of 1 per cent of the grain product of the country. The consumption therefore is too small to think about or care about from that viewpoint.

Now, here is what I particularly want you to think about: How many thousands of men with families in the United States are employed in the brewing business? I can not say; but there are many thousands. There are thousands in my State, and greater numbers in other States. Altogether, I suspect, there may be a hundred thousand men in the United States employed in this way, most of them with families. If you close the breweries, you will put these people out of employment; you will send in this time of war thousands of men with families into the streets without employment, to say nothing of the loss to those whose money is invested. These people must have some way of supporting themselves, or else they become vagabonds and a charge upon public charity. Is that view of this subject worth thinking about? I merely suggest this view for your serious consideration—if only you will consider it seriously—and leave it at that. I have not time to discuss it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I shall occupy but a moment in the discussion of the pending amendment. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa is not a prohibition measure, and the Senator himself has so stated. I do not think it is a great conservation measure—that is, in the form in which it is now. I proposed an amendment a short time ago, but I was unable to get a record vote upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair inquires of the Senator from North Dakota whether or not he submits an amendment, and calls his attention to the fact that he has already spoken on the pending amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. For the purpose of speaking to the bill, I will offer an amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

Mr. GRONNA. I offer it as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, and ask to have it read before I proceed to speak.

Mr. OVERMAN. It has been read once.

Mr. GRONNA. Not this one.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, in the proper place, the following——

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Senator if he will not consent to have his amendment printed in the RECORD, unless he is going to insist on it.

Mr. GRONNA. It is very important to have the Senators know what it is.

Mr. OVERMAN. It can be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed substitute.

The Secretary read as follows:

That for the purpose of conserving during the present war all agricultural food products and to prohibit the manufacture of said food products into alcoholic liquors it shall be unlawful during such period for any person, firm, corporation, or association to use for manufacture into alcohol or alcoholic liquors any cereals, vegetable, fruits, or any agricultural food product: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the Government of the United States, through the Secretary of Agriculture, from issuing to any person, firm, corporation, or association a license to use any such agricultural food products in the manufacture of alcohol for use in the manufacture of high explosives, or for any other purpose necessary to carry on the war, or for sacramental or mechanical purposes.

SEC. 2. That the manufacture, sale, or gift of any alcohol or alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited, but it shall be lawful for any person, firm, corporation, or association to use, manufacture, or redistill into alcohol for manufacture of explosives or other military, industrial, or scientific purposes any and all intoxicating liquors now in existence and which may have been manufactured or distilled prior to the passage and approval of this act; and when such liquor is so used, manufactured, or redistilled the tax thereon, as now provided for, shall be waived or refunded. All the provisions of this act shall be carried out under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

SEC. 3. That any person, firm, corporation, or association who shall violate the provisions of this act shall be guilty of felony and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment at hard labor not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I beg the attention of the Senators for just a moment.

Section 2 of this substitute provides for redistillation of the whisky now on hand. It has been stated upon this floor that we have at least 300,000,000 gallons of whisky on hand. If redistilled and used in the manufacture of high explosives—and I think every Senator here realizes the need of alcohol in the manufacture of explosives—that would be the means of conserving 75,000,000 bushels of grain. This is a real conservation measure and prohibition measure during the war. I trust that the Senators who are here will take enough time to consider this matter, even if it is late, because I believe that this provision is worthy of your consideration.

We know that we are going to have a short crop this year. I know that an enormous amount of grain is being asked by the allies. I know that we can not furnish it to them. I know that millions of bushels of grain must be used in the manufacture of alcohol to be used in the manufacture of high explosives. We can take this liquor, pay for it, convert these distilleries into munition factories, and these men need not lose a dollar, and the Government of the United States will have saved, for the allies and for itself, at least 75,000,000 bushels of grain.

Now, I do not want to delay the Senate any further. Section 1 is practically the same as the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, except that I have not parceled out any particular locality. I do not believe that in times of war any particular industry should be favored. You have protected the grape industry, you have protected the fruit industry, you have protected the molasses industry in the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa. My bill does not except anything that is fit for food, because I believe it is more important to successfully carry on and prosecute this war, to conserve it all for food, rather than to have it manufactured into drink.

Upon the substitute I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. On that the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S name was called). The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has been called from the Chamber on official business. He is paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. If the Senator from Oregon were here and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as before and withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). My pair, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and withhold my vote.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] on important business and his pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for all votes to-day.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], I withhold my vote.

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]; and

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—24.

So Mr. GRONNA's amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of Mr. CUMMINS was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa as amended.

Mr. STERLING. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate. I only want to say that I have refused to vote for these amendments, because I have a very strong conviction, without criticizing the Senator who is responsible for the amendment or any who have supported it, that it is a very inconsistent and a very unreasonable and a very unwise thing to do, to bring a measure of such transcendent importance as this and hook it on a bill which has nothing to do with the question. Because of that I have refused to support it. I am not sure that I would not be willing to vote for a genuinely grain-conserving proposition in dealing with the question in time of war, but before I consent to vote for it I want very much to know more than has been developed in this one debate, limited to 10 minutes. I think I ought to say this in justice to myself.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, having occupied very little time in the discussion of this important bill, I feel justified, notwithstanding the impatience of the Senate to vote, to occupy possibly five minutes in presenting one phase of the subject to the Senate.

Mr. President, on the 7th day of May I submitted to the Senate a table prepared by the Old Dutch Market Co., covering 60 items, including groceries, beef, pork, lard, vegetables, and fruits, which table showed that from April, 1914, to April, 1917, the increase in prices averaged 85.32 per cent.

I now beg to submit another table prepared by the same authorities showing that from October, 1916, to May, 1917, there has been an average increase of 54 per cent in the same products, covering 79 items. The upward swing in prices goes on uninterruptedly, and no man is wise enough to suggest when it will come to an end unless it can be reached through some form of legislation.

I ask unanimous consent to have the table to which I have alluded printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. GALLINGER. It seems to me, Mr. President, that if we can prevent cereals and grains from being converted into alcoholic beverages the food supply will be greatly added to and possibly that fact may tend to prevent any further enhancement of food prices.

For that reason, Mr. President, believing that we ought to conserve our food supply as much as possible, and feeling that it is much better to use the products of the farm for food purposes rather than to convert them into alcoholic beverages, I warmly support the amendment submitted by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I voted for the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] because it would conserve effectively a great food supply, not less than 75,000,000 bushels of grain, of which not less than 15,000,000 bushels is wheat. Had that substitute been adopted it would have conserved the food supply of this country for the next year.

I shall vote against the pending amendment because, in my judgment, it is not a real conservation measure. It will not conserve the food supply of the country. No rye, which is a grain food, enters into the manufacture of beer. No wheat enters into the manufacture of beer. The corn used in the manufacture of beer is a negligible quantity. Fifty-two million bushels of barley were consumed in the manufacture of beer last year. Under the terms of this amendment you will destroy the market for this year's barley crop. The farmers have planted this year's crop with the expectation of the usual market, but this proposition destroys any hope of return. It is a blow at the farmers of Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, the great barley-producing section. Barley is not a human food. It can be fed to hogs. But the farmers of this country would not sow it unless they expected to be able to market it. Because of the great injustice which this amendment will work, because it is not a real conservation measure, because it is unfair and discriminates against these farmers who have planted in good faith, I shall vote against it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's name was called). The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has been called from the Chamber on official business. He is paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. If the Senator from Oregon were here and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair as before, and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote I would vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair and its transfer that I made on the last vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as was announced on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). Has the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have a pair with that Senator and withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). In the absence of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], with whom I am paired, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement of my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]; and

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

So Mr. CUMMINS's amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I call the attention of the Senator managing the bill to page 36. I should like to have order so that the Senator may hear me.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Connecticut to yield to me for a moment. I rise to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill if it is his thought or purpose to get a final vote on the bill to-night.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to do so, but I think it is impossible. However, I should like to get the bill into the Senate. There are no other amendments that I know of.

Mr. THOMAS. I have an amendment to offer, a very important one, and it will be controverted also.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the bill is to go over until Monday, I think we might as well adjourn or take a recess at the present time.

Mr. OVERMAN. If there are no considerable amendments to be presented, I should like to have the bill reported to the Senate, and then we can discuss amendments in the Senate, and notice can be given of amendments to be reserved, if any reservations are to be made.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say that I personally want to do what I can to expedite the passage of the bill, but if it is to go over it seems to me that it might as well go over now.

Mr. OVERMAN. It will go over, but I am going to notify the Senate that I shall ask to have a night session on Monday unless we finish the bill before a night session on Monday becomes necessary.

I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock on Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m., Saturday, May 12, 1917) the Senate took a recess until Monday, May 14, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 12, 1917.

The House met at 10.30 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal and everliving God, our Heavenly Father, we thank Thee for that sublime faith which in all the past has brought men to Thy feet in prayer, where they have found strength, consolation, hope, and guidance; for every thought evolved, for every truth discovered which holds us close to Thee and makes for righteousness in the soul. Grant that each of us may be able to say now and always, "Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life; and I shall dwell in the house of the Lord forever." We need in this hour of trial the faith, hope, and confidence of all the great men of the past to insure a successful issue of the war in which we have been plunged; that truth, liberty, justice, and righteousness may find full fruition in a world-wide peace which shall endure; for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 33. Joint resolution to relieve the owners of mining claims who have been mustered into the military or naval service of the United States as officers or enlisted men from performing assessment work during the term of such service.

INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama calls up the conference report which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I renew the request that I made yesterday, that debate on this report be limited to two hours, one half to be controlled by myself and the other half by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], and that at the end of that time the previous question be ordered on the adoption of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that debate on this conference report be limited to two hours, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], and that at the end of the two hours' debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, so far as I am concerned I have no objection to the proposition unless it involves something else. It was stated yesterday that a point of order might be made upon this report, and there may be a motion to recommit the report. I have not examined the precedents to know whether a motion to recommit would be in order after the previous question is ordered, or what would be the effect upon a point of order against the conference report if the House now agrees to order the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that if any gentleman has any point of order to make, he had better make it now.

Mr. MANN. I shall not make any point of order. It is not time to make the point of order now. You can not make a point of order until the conference report is laid before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that. The Clerk will read the conference report. The Chair will put the gentleman's request after the statement has been read.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's request has not been put.

The SPEAKER. No; and the Chair is not going to put it until after this report is read.

Mr. GARDNER. Is it not in order for the gentleman to ask unanimous consent at any time?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; but everybody seems to be sort of mixed up about this thing, and the Chair thought that gentlemen, all of them, might collect their thoughts while the Clerk was reading the conference report. The Clerk will read the report. Nobody will lose any rights while I am in the chair.

The Clerk began the reading of the conference report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the conference report itself, I presume, is quite long, and I do not believe there will be any objection if the gentleman asks unanimous consent to read the statement in lieu of the conference report, with the same rights reserved——

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. MANN. With the same rights reserved at the end of the reading of the statement that the House would have at the end of the reading of the report.

Mr. DENT. I make that request; but I will state that the conference report contains the bill itself. It is the bill as agreed upon by the conferees of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report, with all rights reserved. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement of the House conferees.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 49).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That in view of the existing emergency, which demands the raising of troops in addition to those now available, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized—

"First. Immediately to raise, organize, officer, and equip all or such number of increments of the Regular Army provided by the national defense act approved June 3, 1916, or such parts thereof as he may deem necessary; to raise all organizations of the Regular Army, including those added by such increments, to the maximum enlisted strength authorized by law. Vacancies in the Regular Army created or caused by the addition of increments as herein authorized which can not be filled by promotion may be filled by temporary appointment for the period of the emergency or until replaced by permanent appointments or by provisional appointments made under the provisions of section 23 of the national defense act approved June 3, 1916, and hereafter provisional appointments under said section may be terminated whenever it is determined, in the manner prescribed by the President, that the officer has not the suitability and fitness requisite for permanent appointment.

"Second. To draft into the military service of the United States, organize, and officer, in accordance with the provisions of section 111 of said national defense act, so far as the provisions of said section may be applicable and not inconsistent with the terms of this act, any or all members of the National Guard and of the National Guard Reserves, and said members so drafted into the military service of the United States shall serve therein for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged: Provided, That when so drafted the organizations or units of the National Guard shall, so far as practicable, retain the State designations of their respective organizations.

"Third. To raise by draft as herein provided, organize and equip an additional force of 500,000 enlisted men, or such part or parts thereof as he may at any time deem necessary, and to provide the necessary officers, line and staff, for said force and for organizations of the other forces hereby authorized, or by combining organizations of said other forces, by ordering members of the Officers' Reserve Corps to temporary duty in accordance with the provisions of section 38 of the national defense act approved June 3, 1916; by appointment from the Regular Army, the Officers' Reserve Corps, from those duly qualified and registered pursuant to section 23 of the act of Congress approved January 21, 1903 (32 Stat. L., p. 775), from the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, from those who have been graduated from educational institutions at which military instruction is compulsory, or from those who have had honorable service in the Regular Army, the National Guard, or in the Volunteer forces, or from the country at large; by assigning retired officers of the Regular Army to active duty with such force with their rank on the retired list and the full pay and allowances of their grade; or by the appointment of retired officers and enlisted men, active or retired, of the Regular Army as commissioned officers in such forces: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organizations of the Regular Army: Provided further, That the President is authorized to increase or decrease the number of organizations prescribed for the typical brigades, divisions, or army corps of the Regular Army, and to prescribe such new and different organizations and personnel for army corps, divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions, squadrons, companies, troops, and batteries as the efficiency of the service may require: Provided further, That the number of organizations in a regiment shall not be increased nor shall the number of regiments be decreased: Provided further, That the President in his discretion may organize, officer, and equip for each Infantry and Cavalry brigade three machine-gun companies, and for each Infantry and Cavalry division four machine-gun companies, all in addition to the machine-gun companies comprised in organizations included in such brigades and divisions: Provided further, That the President in his discretion may organize for each division one armored motor car machine-gun company. The machine-gun companies organized under this section shall consist of such commissioned and enlisted personnel and be equipped in such manner as the President may prescribe: And provided further, That officers with rank not above that of colonel shall be appointed by the President alone, and officers above that grade by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided further, That the President may in his discretion, recommission in the Coast Guard persons who have heretofore held commissions in the Revenue-Cutter Service or the Coast Guard and have left the service honorably, after ascertaining that they are qualified for service physically, morally, and as to age and military fitness.

"Fourth. The President is further authorized, in his discretion and at such time as he may determine, to raise and begin the training of an additional force of 500,000 men organized, officered, and equipped as provided for the force first mentioned in the preceding paragraph of this section.

"Fifth. To raise by draft, organize, equip, and officer, as provided in the third paragraph of this section, in addition to and for each of the above forces, such recruit training units as he may deem necessary for the maintenance of such forces at the maximum strength.

"Sixth. To raise, organize, officer, and maintain during the emergency such number of ammunition batteries and battalions, depot batteries and battalions, and such artillery parks, with such numbers and grades of personnel as he may deem necessary. Such organizations shall be officered in the manner provided in the third paragraph of this section, and enlisted men may be assigned to said organizations from any of the forces herein provided for or raised by selective draft as by this act provided.

"SEC. 2. That the enlisted men required to raise and maintain the organizations of the Regular Army and to complete and maintain the organizations embodying the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, at the maximum legal strength as by this act provided, shall be raised by voluntary enlistment, or if and whenever the President decides that they can not effectually be so raised or maintained, then by selective draft; and all other forces hereby authorized shall be raised and maintained by selective draft exclusively; but this provision shall not prevent the transfer to any force of training cadres from other forces. Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, both inclusive, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act. Quotas for the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or subdivisions thereof, shall be determined in proportion to the population thereof, and credit shall be given to any State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof, for the number of men who were in the military service of the United States as members of the National Guard on April 1, 1917, or who have since said date entered the military service of the United States from any such State, Territory, District, or subdivision, either as members of the Regular Army or the National Guard. All persons drafted into the service of the United States and all officers accepting commissions in the forces herein provided for shall, from the date of said draft or acceptance, be subject to the laws and regulations governing the Regular Army, except as to promotions, so far as such laws and regulations are applicable to persons whose permanent retention in the military service on the active or retired list is not contemplated by existing law, and those drafted shall be required to serve for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged: Provided, That the President is authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment or draft, as herein provided, special and technical troops as he may deem necessary, and to embody them into organizations and to officer them as provided in the third paragraph of section 1 and section 9 of this act. Organizations of the forces herein provided for, except the Regular Army, shall, as far as the interests of the service permit, be composed of men who come, and of officers who are appointed from, the same State or locality.

"SEC. 3. No bounty shall be paid to induce any person to enlist in the military service of the United States; and no person liable to military service shall hereafter be permitted or allowed to furnish a substitute for such service; nor shall any substitute be received, enlisted, or enrolled in the military service of the United States; and no such person shall be permitted to escape such service or to be discharged therefrom prior to the expiration of his term of service by the payment of money or any other valuable thing whatsoever as consideration for his release from military service or liability thereto.

"SEC. 4. That the Vice President of the United States, the officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, regular or duly ordained ministers of religion, students who at the time of the approval of this act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools, and all persons in the military and naval service of the United States shall be exempt from the selective draft herein prescribed; and nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any of the forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well-recognized religious sect or organization at present organized and existing and whose existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organizations, but no person so exempted shall be exempted from service in any capacity that the President shall declare to be noncombatant; and the President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof, or to draft for partial military service only from those liable to draft as in this act provided, persons of the following classes: County and municipal officials; customhouse clerks; persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mails; artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States, and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate; pilots; mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States; persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency; those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable; and those found to be physically or morally deficient. No exemption or exclusion shall continue when a cause therefor no longer exists: Provided, That notwithstanding the exemptions enumerated herein, each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia shall be required to supply its quota in the proportion that its population bears to the total population of the United States.

"The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to create and establish throughout the several States and subdivisions thereof and in the Territories and the District of Columbia local boards, and where, in his discretion, practicable and desirable, there shall be created and established one such local board in each county or similar subdivision in each State, and one for approximately each 30,000 of population in each city of 30,000 population or over, according to the last census taken or estimates furnished by the Bureau of Census of the Department of Commerce. Such boards shall be appointed by the President, and shall consist of three or more members, none of whom shall be connected with the Military Establishment, to be chosen from among the local authorities of such subdivisions or from other citizens residing in the subdivision or area in which the respective boards will have jurisdiction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President. Such boards shall have power within their respective jurisdictions to hear and determine, subject to review as hereinafter provided, all questions of exemption under this act, and all questions of or claims for including or discharging individuals or classes of individuals from the selective draft, which shall be made under rules and regulations prescribed by the President, except, any and every question or claim for including or excluding or discharging persons or classes of persons from the selective draft under the provisions of this act authorizing the President to exclude or discharge from the selective draft.

"'Persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment, or the effective operation of the military forces, or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency.'

"The President is hereby authorized to establish additional boards, one in each Federal judicial district of the United States, consisting of such number of citizens, not connected with the Military Establishment, as the President may determine, who shall be appointed by the President. The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to establish more than one such board in any Federal judicial district of the United States, or to establish one such board having jurisdiction of an area extending into more than one Federal judicial district. Such district boards shall review on appeal and affirm, modify or reverse any decision of any local board having jurisdiction in the area in which any such district board has jurisdiction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President. Such district boards shall have exclusive original jurisdiction within their respective areas to hear and determine all questions or claims for including or excluding or discharging persons or classes of persons from the selective draft, under the provisions of this act, not included within the original jurisdiction of such local boards.

"The decisions of such district boards shall be final except that in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, he may affirm, modify or reverse any such decision.

"Any vacancy in any such local board or district board shall be filled by the President, and any member of any such local board or district board may be removed and another appointed in his place by the President, whenever he considers that the interest of the Nation demands it.

"The President shall make rules and regulations governing the organization and procedure of such local boards and district boards, and providing for and governing appeals from such local boards to such district boards, and reviews of the decisions of any local board by the district board having jurisdiction, and determining and prescribing the several areas in which the respective local boards and district boards shall have jurisdiction, and all other rules and regulations necessary to carry out the terms and provisions of this section, and shall provide for the issuance of certificates of exemption, or partial or limited exemptions, and for a system to exclude and discharge individuals from selective draft.

"SEC. 5. That all male persons between the ages of 21 and 30, both inclusive, shall be subject to registration in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President; and upon proclamation by the President or other public notice given by him or by his direction stating the time and place of such registration it shall be the duty of all persons of the designated ages, except officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, the Navy, and the National Guard and Naval Militia while in the service of the United States, to present themselves for and submit to registration under the provisions of this act; and every such person shall be deemed to have notice of the requirements of this act upon the publication of said proclamation or other notice as aforesaid given by the President or by his direction; and any person who shall willfully fail or refuse to present himself for registration or to submit thereto as herein provided, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, and shall thereupon be duly registered: Provided, That in the call of the docket precedence shall be given, in courts trying the same, to the trial of criminal proceedings under this act: Provided further, That persons shall be subject to registration as herein provided who shall have attained their twenty-first birthday and who shall not have attained their thirty-first birthday on or before the day set for the registration, and all persons so registered shall be and remain subject to draft into the forces hereby authorized, unless exempted or excused therefrom as in this act provided: Provided further, That in the case of temporary absence from actual place of legal residence of any person liable to registration as provided herein such registration may be made by mail under regulations to be prescribed by the President.

"SEC. 6. That the President is hereby authorized to utilize the service of any or all departments and any or all officers or agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and subdivisions thereof, in the execution of this act, and all officers and agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and subdivisions thereof, and of the District of Columbia, and all persons designated or appointed under regulations prescribed by the President whether such appointments are made by the President himself or by the governor or other officer of any State or Territory to perform any duty in the execution of this act, are hereby required to perform such duty as the President shall order or direct, and all such officers and agents and persons so designated or appointed shall hereby have full authority for all acts done by them in the execution of this act by the direction of the President. Correspondence in the execution of this act may be carried in penalty envelopes bearing the frank of the War Department. Any person charged as herein provided with the duty of carrying into effect any of the provisions of this act or the regulations made or directions given thereunder, who shall fail or neglect to perform such duty; and any person charged with such duty or having and exercising any authority under said act, regulations, or directions who shall knowingly make or be a party to the making of any false or incorrect registration, physical examination, exemption, enlistment, enrollment, or muster; and any person who shall make or be a party to the making of any false statement or certificate as to the fitness or liability of himself or any other person for service under the provisions of this act, or regulations made by the President thereunder, or otherwise evades or aids another to evade the requirements of this act or of said regulations, or who, in any manner, shall fail or neglect fully to perform any duty required of him in the execution of this act, shall, if not subject to military law, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, or, if subject to military law, shall be tried by court-martial and suffer such punishment as a court-martial may direct.

"SEC. 7. That the qualifications and conditions for voluntary enlistment as herein provided shall be the same as those prescribed by existing law for enlistments in the Regular Army, except that recruits must be between the ages of 18 and 40 years, both inclusive, at the time of their enlistment; and such enlistments shall be for the period of the emergency unless sooner discharged. All enlistments, including those in the Regular Army Reserve, which are in force on the date of the approval of this act and which would terminate during the emergency, shall continue in force during the emergency unless sooner discharged; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to shorten the period of any existing enlistment: Provided, That all persons enlisted or drafted under any of the provisions of this act shall as far as practicable be grouped into units by States and the political subdivisions of the same: Provided further, That all persons who have enlisted since April 1, 1917, either in the Regular Army or in the National Guard, and all persons who have enlisted in the National Guard since June 3, 1916, upon their application, shall be discharged upon the termination of the existing emergency.

"The President may provide for the discharge of any or all enlisted men whose status with respect to dependents renders such discharge advisable; and he may also authorize the employment on any active duty of retired enlisted men of the Regular Army, either with their rank on the retired list or in higher enlisted grades, and such retired enlisted men shall receive the full pay and allowances of the grades in which they are actively employed.

"SEC. 8. That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is authorized to appoint for the period of the existing emergency such general officers of appropriate grades as may be necessary for duty with brigades, divisions, and higher units in which the forces provided for herein may be organized by the President, and general officers of appropriate grade for the several Coast Artillery districts. In so far as such appointments may be made from any of the forces herein provided for, the appointees may be selected irrespective of the grades held by them in such forces. Vacancies in all grades in the Regular Army resulting from the appointment of officers thereof to higher grades in the force other than the Regular Army herein provided for shall be filled by temporary promotions and appointments in the manner prescribed for filling temporary vacancies by section 114 of the national defense act approved June 3, 1916; and officers appointed under the provisions of this act to higher grades in the forces other than the Regular Army herein provided for shall not vacate their permanent commissions nor be prejudiced in their relative or lineal standing in the Regular Army.

"SEC. 9. That the appointments authorized and made as provided by the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth paragraphs of section one and by section eight of this act, and the temporary appointments in the Regular Army authorized by the first paragraph of section 1 of this act, shall be for the period of the emergency, unless sooner terminated by discharge or otherwise. The President is hereby authorized to discharge any officer from the office held by him under such appointment for any cause which, in the judgment of the President, would promote the public service; and the general commanding any division and higher tactical organization or territorial department is authorized to appoint from time to time military boards of not less than three nor more than five officers of the forces herein provided for to examine into and report upon the capacity, qualification, conduct, and efficiency of any commissioned officer within his command other than officers of the Regular Army holding permanent or provisional commissions therein. Each member of such board shall be superior in rank to the officer whose qualifications are to be inquired into, and if the report of such board be adverse to the continuance of any such officer and be approved by the President, such officer shall be discharged from the service at the discretion of the President with one month's pay and allowances.

"SEC. 10. That all officers and enlisted men of the forces herein provided for other than the Regular Army shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army; and commencing June one, nineteen hundred and seventeen, and continuing until the termination of the emergency, all enlisted men of the Army of the United States in active service whose base pay does not exceed $21 per month shall receive an increase of $10 per month; those whose base pay is $24, an increase of $8 per month; those whose base pay is $30, $36, or $40, an increase of $6 per month; and those whose base pay is $45 or more, an increase of $5 per month: Provided, That the increases of pay herein authorized shall not enter into the computation of continuous-service pay.

"SEC. 11. That all existing restrictions upon the detail, detachment, and employment of officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army are hereby suspended for the period of the present emergency.

"SEC. 12. That the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army, is authorized to make such regulations governing the prohibition of alcoholic liquors in or near military camps and to the officers and enlisted men of the Army as he may from time to time deem necessary or advisable: Provided, That no person, corporation, partnership, or association shall sell, supply, or have in his or its possession any intoxicating or spirituous liquors at any military station, cantonment, camp, fort, post, officers' or enlisted men's club, which is being used at the time for military purposes under this act, but the Secretary of War may make regulations permitting the sale and use of intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes. It shall be unlawful to sell any intoxicating liquor, including beer, ale, or wine, to any officer or member of the military forces while in uniform, except as herein provided. Any person, corporation, partnership, or association violating the provisions of this section or the regulations made thereunder shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

"SEC. 13. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, empowered, and directed during the present war to do everything by him deemed necessary to suppress and prevent the keeping or setting up of houses of ill fame, brothels, or bawdy houses within such distance as he may deem needful of any military camp, station, fort, post, cantonment, training, or mobilization place, and any person, corporation, partnership, or association receiving or permitting to be received for immoral purposes any person into any place, structure, or building used for the purpose of lewdness, assignation, or prostitution within such distance of said places as may be designated, or shall permit any such person to remain for immoral purposes in any such place, structure, or building as aforesaid, or who shall violate any order, rule, or regulation issued to carry out the object and purpose of this section shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

"SEC. 14. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby suspended during the period of this emergency."

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

The differences between the two Houses are found in one amendment, which is a substitute of the Senate bill for the House bill, after the enacting clause.

Through the entire bill, as agreed to in conference, the Senate accepted the House language using the period of the existing emergency instead of the period of the war.

The organization of the Army was changed so as to authorize the President to increase or decrease the number of organizations for typical divisions, brigades, or army corps, and to prescribe new organizations and personnel for army corps, divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions, squadrons, companies, troops, and batteries. The object of this was, of course, to allow an increase of the war strength of these various branches of the service beyond that now provided by law. It is provided, however, that the number of organizations in a regiment shall not be increased nor the number of regiments decreased. The President is also authorized to organize for each Infantry and Cavalry brigade three machine-gun companies, and for each Infantry and Cavalry division four machine-gun companies, in addition to those now authorized. The President is also authorized to organize for each division one armored motor-car machine-gun company.

The House also adopted a provision, with some slight changes in the language, of the Senate authorizing the recommission in the Coast Guard of persons who have heretofore held commissions in the Revenue-Cutter Service or Coast Guard.

The House receded from its position reinstating the present law authorizing voluntary enlistment of persons over 18 years of age without the consent of the parent or guardian.

The age limit of persons subject to draft was fixed at not less than 21 nor more than 31. The House language providing for the exemption of regular or duly ordained ministers was adopted, and the House agreed to the Senate provision extending to students who at the time of the passage of this act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools. To those who may be exempted from selected draft, or selected for partial military service only, the conferees added county and municipal officials.

The President is authorized to establish throughout the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia local boards. As far as practicable they shall be created in each county or similar subdivision of each State, and also one for approximately each 30,000 of population of each city of 30,000 population or more, according to the last census taken or the estimates furnished by the Bureau of Census, Department of Commerce. Such boards shall be appointed by the President, shall consist of three or more members not connected with the Military Establishment, and chosen from the local authorities or other citizens resident in the subdivision in which the board will have jurisdiction, under rules and regulations prescribed by the President. Such local boards shall have power to determine all exemptions, under rules and regulations prescribed by the President, except the exemption of those engaged in industries, including agriculture. An additional board or boards is or are authorized in each judicial district of the United States, the members to be residents of such district, to be appointed by the President, and not connected with the Military Establishment. This board will have appellate jurisdiction of all matters coming before the local boards, and original jurisdiction of exemptions of persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the national interest during the emergency. Decisions of the district board shall be final, except that the President may, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, affirm, modify, or reverse the same. The President is authorized to make rules and regulations to carry out the terms and provisions of this section and to provide for the issuance of certificates of exemption and partial or limited exemptions.

The conferees excluded from registration officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army and Navy and of the National Guard and Naval Militia, while in the service of the United States. It is also provided that those absent from their legal residence shall have the right to register by mail under such regulations as may be prescribed by the President.

The President is authorized to utilize the services of all departments, officials, and agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia in the execution of the act, and a penalty is provided for failure or neglect of duty.

The Senate receded from its provision authorizing all voluntary enlistments to be in the Army of the United States and their assignment to any force not raised exclusively by selective draft.

The Senate also receded from its provision making each chief of bureau a major general.

The Senate also receded from its provision authorizing the organization of four Infantry divisions by voluntary enlistment, as well as the provision authorizing the enlistment of three or more regiments of mounted volunteers to be used in protecting property and citizens along the southern border.

The conferees agreed upon an increase of the pay of enlisted men of the Army as follows: Those whose base pay does not exceed $21 per month, an increase of $10; those whose base pay is $24 per month, an increase of $8; those whose base pay is $30, $36, or $40 per month, an increase of $6; those whose base pay is $45 or more per month, an increase of $5. This increase is not to be taken into consideration, however, in computing continuous-service pay.

The House receded from the Senate provisions as to the sale, etc., of alcoholic liquors, and the maintenance of brothels, etc., at military posts, camps, forts, etc.

The conferees agreed to the provision of the House bill requiring organizations or units of the National Guard, so far as practicable, to retain the States designations of their respective organizations.

The conferees also retained the House provision that organizations of all forces provided for, except the Regular Army, shall, as far as the interests of the service permit, be composed of men who come and of officers who are appointed from the same State or locality.

S. H. DENT, Jr.,
W. J. FIELDS,
PERCY E. QUIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] asks unanimous consent that debate on this conference report be limited to two hours, one half the time to be controlled by himself and the other by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], and that at the end of the two hours the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I believe there is to be a motion to recommit the conference report to the conference committee. It might be well to have the agreement cover the previous question on the motion to recommit, so that debate on all would be ended at the time fixed.

Mr. DENT. I will add that to my request, Mr. Speaker, that the previous question be considered as ordered on the adoption of the report and any motion to recommit.

Mr. MANN. Any motion to recommit with instructions, I think, might properly be presented to begin with, so that every one would know what it is. I do not intend to present it myself, if the previous question is ordered in this way, but if the gentleman will yield to have the motion to recommit made, it may be pending.

Mr. DENT. I agree to that.

The SPEAKER. Now, let us have a fair agreement about that. We do not want to get into any hole or misunderstanding. The request that I am to put is that debate run for not more than two hours, half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] and half by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]; that at the end of that time the previous question be considered as ordered, not only on the conference report but on a motion to recommit, if any there be. Is that the request?

Mr. DENT. That is the request.

Mr. LENROOT. Reserving the right to object, I understood the gentleman from Alabama to agree that the motion to recommit might be made now and be pending.

Mr. MANN. He stated that he would yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The further agreement is that the motion to recommit may be made now.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] take charge of the time on this side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] be substituted for himself to control half the time. Is there objection to that?

Mr. DENT. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

There was no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD a copy of a letter addressed by Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University, to Hon. JAMES R. MANN, Republican leader of the House. It has reference to the pending war-revenue bill. Dr. Butler is one of the greatest educators and publicists in the world, and this letter will be of peculiar interest to the Members of the Congress, both House and Senate. I ask unanimous consent to have it extended in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY,
New York, May 11, 1917.

Hon. JOHN R. MANN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MANN: I write to offer a very urgent suggestion that no matter what may be the final provisions of the war-tax bill now pending in the House, it contains a specific provision limiting its operation either to a definite stated time or, at most, to the duration of the war. It seems clear that the bill will contain many provisions that are objectionable on economic and public grounds. There will hardly be either time or opportunity fully to debate and to consider these. It is therefore doubly important that they be not included as part of our permanent taxing policy, even by inference.

Faithfully, yours,

NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following motion to recommit.

Mr. DENT. I understand that this is offered at this time simply for information.

The SPEAKER. Simply that Members may know what is in it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Motion to recommit by Mr. ANTHONY: I move to recommit the conference report to the committee of conference with instructions to the managers on the part of the House to agree to that part of section 1 of the Senate amendment which reads as follows:

"7. The President is further authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment, to organize, and equip not to exceed four Infantry divisions, the officers of which shall be selected in the manner provided by paragraph 3 of section 1 of this act: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organization of the Regular Army: And provided further, That there shall be no enlistments in said force of men under 25 years of age at time of enlisting: And provided further, That no such volunteer force shall be accepted in any unit smaller than a division."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point that no quorum is present, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and eleven Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Doorkeeper was directed to close the doors and the Sergeant at Arms to notify absentees.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Borland	Focht	McAndrews	Rucker
Buchanan	Francis	McLaughlin, Mich.	Saunders, Va.
Capstick	Gandy	Martin, Ill.	Scott, Pa.
Carew	Graham, Pa.	Meeker	Scully

Dewalt	Huddleston	Mudd	Steenerson
Doremus	Hulbert	Nelson	Sullivan

Eagle	Kreider	Pou	Thomas
Edmonds	Lee, Ga.	Price	Tilson
Ellsworth	Linthicum	Rainey	Wason
Estopinal	Littlepage	Rodenberg	Webb
Flynn	London	Rowland	Winslow

The SPEAKER. On this call 367 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to be permitted to offer an amendment to the motion to recommit.

Mr. DENT. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know what it is.

Mr. GOOD. It is an amendment in regard to the increase of pay. The amendment I want to suggest is that the figures "$10" be stricken out and "$15" inserted; the figure "$8" sticken out and "$12" inserted; the figure "$6" stricken out and "$8" inserted; the figure "$5" stricken out and "$6" inserted. That is in section 10 of the conference report.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, the conferees went fully into that question, and I will have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama objects.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable criticism of the conferees on the part of the Senate and the House in delaying action on this bill. This bill passed the Senate after having passed the House, in final shape so as to go to conference, last Monday a week ago. After the conference was agreed upon between the two Houses, they immediately went into session with three separate bills to pass and agree upon—the Military Academy bill, which, of course, did not take much time; the Regular Army appropriation bill, carrying two hundred and seventy-odd million dollars, which took us practically a solid week to iron out, if I may use that expression—this appropriation bill. So that the conferees did not go into conference on the bill to temporarily increase the Military Establishment until one week ago to-day.

The War Department was urging us to pass the annual Army appropriation bill, which carried with it certain items that became immediately available, because they claimed that they were absolutely in need of that money now. So that the conferees took that matter up first and went into conference on this particular measure just one week ago to-day. By noon of Thursday the conferees had agreed upon a bill. In writing this bill, Mr. Speaker, the conferees were face to face with an entirely new situation—a new proposition to put into effect the method of raising an Army in this country. I may say—and, I think, without hurting anybody's feelings and without violating any confidence—that the War Department itself came to the conferees with different propositions as to the tribunals or boards to pass upon the question of exemption. They would come one day with a proposition and, after discussion with the conferees, they themselves would admit that the proposition contained defects, and ask for another nights' sleep over the proposition, and then come back again with a new and different proposition as to the creation and establishment of these boards.

That proposition alone took several days to finally perfect. It may be yet that the conferees, with the aid and assistance of the Judge Advocate General's department and the special counsel that they have assisting them in this matter, have not worked out as perfect a system as could be devised. We believe, however, that if there is nothing else in the bill to commend it to the House, to the Congress, and to the Executive, that that feature alone is sufficient to at least make this bill in a measure popular in the country. We provide that there shall be created local boards substantially and as far as practical in every county in each State of the Union, or in similar subdivisions of the different States of the Union; that this board shall be composed, if practicable, of local county officials; that if it can not be composed of such county officials it shall be selected from resident citizens of the particular county involved. Each member of this board must, therefore, be a civilian, and it is expressly provided that he shall in no way be connected with the Military Establishment of this country. [Applause.] That local board has the authority to pass upon all questions of exemption, except the exclusion of those persons engaged in industries and in agriculture necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the efficiency of its administration. The conferees thought—and in that I may say they had the approval of the War Department—that that particular question should be taken away from the local communities for fear that favoritism would be used in its administration. Therefore the conferees provided another and an additional board, to be appointed in each judicial district of the United States by the President, which board shall have original jurisdiction of all claims of exemption of those persons engaged in industries and agriculture necessary to the efficiency of the Military Establishment. The conferees further gave to this board in each

Federal judicial district appellate jurisdiction over the local boards in each county and in each city. I neglected to mention the fact that the bill provides also for a local board in each city of at least 30,000 inhabitants, and as many additional boards for each 30,000 in the larger cities as the President may determine to be necessary; so that the administration of this draft law, as agreed on in conference, is brought home to the people themselves. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I do not consider that it is necessary that I should go into each detail of this report. I am sure that each Member of the House is familiar with what the conference report contains. It was printed in the RECORD yesterday as a part of the proceedings of the Senate. I may add, however, that the conferees on the part of the House retained in the bill the House provision providing that State designations in the different organizations should be preserved, and providing, as far as practicable, that officers and men should come from the same localities and communities [applause], so that really, if you will examine the report, you will find that the House conferees gained a large majority of the points of difference between the two Houses.

We went into that conference instructed by a vote of 170 to 106 not to incorporate the so-called Roosevelt amendment. The conferees on the part of the House stood by the instructions of the House, and although personally I favored from the beginning and personally I still favor the volunteer system, yet after this House, by an overwhelming majority, told me that I was wrong, I have stood logically by the position of the House. [Applause.] I consider it absolutely illogical. I can not understand how any man can logically defend the position which he takes here on the floor that the volunteer system is wrong and that the draft or conscript system is right, when he then turns around and says that we shall make a special privilege in favor of some particular volunteer. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Is there any more inconsistency between conscription and volunteering in the National Guard, or is it merely that the gentleman has invented an argument that the National Guard is an existing arrangement?

Mr. DENT. There is no inconsistency in that, because my position and the position that I took on the floor of this House when this bill was here several weeks ago was that you could resort to the draft as a matter of last resort, and to give the privilege to volunteer first, and that is the law with reference to the National Guard now. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Inasmuch as there is an opportunity for several hundred thousand to volunteer now in the National Guard, why not let just a few more volunteer under Col. Roosevelt?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, the answer to that is, if you are going to allow a few to volunteer, why not allow everyone to volunteer? [Applause.]

Mr. SANFORD. And I would like to suggest to the gentleman that a distinguished ex-governor of New York State, Mr. Sulzer, would also like to have a division.

Mr. DENT. Yes; and I would like also to state in this connection that the Senate inserted what is known as the Fall amendment, by which the States of New Mexico, Arizona, and Texas—the border States—would be permitted to organize four regiments of mounted volunteers, but the conferees rejected that on the same proposition, because it was not consistent with what both the House and the Senate, by an overwhelming majority, said should be the system by which you would raise an additional army.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. For a question.

Mr. DENISON. If the military age for these volunteers were placed at above 31 years, would the gentleman still think it inconsistent?

Mr. DENT. Why, certainly, I think it is inconsistent. I do not see how I could make myself any plainer, when I make the statement that this House has decided that the volunteer system is a failure, and yet the gentleman wants to turn around and recognize it in some special form.

Mr. DENISON. Perhaps the gentleman did not understand me. If the conference report is accepted, then no one over 31 years of age can get in under any system unless we adopt this amendment. If the age for volunteers is placed at above 31 years——

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that I understood him, and I answered him as I intended to answer him, that the House has declared the volunteer system was a failure, and that the draft was the proper system, and that to make an exception to that is to go against your own declaration.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I wish to state that the House conferees, as is well known, did finally agree to the age limit of 21 to 31 years. We came down nine years and the Senate conferees went up four years. There is some criticism of that, but when conferees are selected, when they go into a conference, it is a question of compromise. It is a question of give and take. We can not expect to get everything, and when the conferees get a large majority of their propositions I think the House ought to be satisfied.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. For one question.

Mr. McCORMICK. The gentleman pointed out that the House, by a vote of 170 to 106, instructed the conferees against the Harding amendment. If the gentleman will refer to the RECORD, he will see that the House, by a vote of 276, instructed the House conferees in favor of the age limit of 40 years. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. That is very true; but, as I said a moment ago, we had to compromise a matter of that kind. The question of age limit was a matter that was in conference between the two Houses, and we could not sit there and say, "You have got to stand by 40 years."

Mr. FIELDS. If the gentleman will permit, on the point the gentleman from Illinois just raised, the question of whether it should go back to 19 instead of 21 was also involved in that vote.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will yield.

Mr. GOOD. The House also by a unanimous vote adopted $30 as the minimum pay of the enlisted man, and the Senate adopted $29, and this conference report is in violation of the almost unanimous action of both Houses reduces it to $25, $4 lower than the Senate amendment and $5 lower than the House amendment. There was no give and take there.

Mr. DENT. I understand what the gentleman refers to. All questions of policy with reference to age limit and amounts that should be paid are not matters of principle; they are questions of policy. The other was a matter of principle.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. As the bill now stands, what is the rule going to be about exemptions of men who are poor and have large dependent families? Who is going to determine that?

Mr. DENT. By local boards in each county. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will have to reserve the balance of my time, as I notice that I have consumed more time than I had intended to use. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has used 19 minutes.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] is recognized for one hour. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as one of the conferees on the pending bill I want to add my statement to the fact that the conferees did their work patiently and faithfully as far as they went. They have perfected well the details of the task which was intrusted to them, but in my judgment they have not gone far enough. They have failed to recognize, in what would appear to be the most practical way, the demand which has been made upon this country in the last two weeks by the commissioners of two of our great allied powers that an American army be sent to the battle lines of France at the earliest possible opportunity. I believe there is a strong sentiment, not only in the House and in the Senate but in the country, that a force be sent to the battle lines in France at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I regret I can not in the few minutes I have. Such a force can not be sent within the time which I believe Marshal Joffre, the French commissioner, has recommended to the War Department unless we resort to the plan of accepting the services of the 100,000 men who, with hearts bursting with patriotism and from every State in the Union, stand ready to-day to enlist under the banner of the one great American competent and capable of leading such an army in France—Theodore Roosevelt. [Applause.] Under the plans of the War Department, it is their idea to take over the first levy of a half a million drafted men, but their idea is to keep them in intensive training in this country one year and then send them abroad. Marshal Joffre has said, and we know it, in spite of the expurgated part of his statement that has been given to the public, that such a force as he desires can be quickly organized in this country, and that with not more than a month or two of preliminary training here at home can be sent to the great training camp at Chalons, France, and with four months' training there, just back of the trenches, be made into the best fighting soldiers that can be found on the battle lines.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman know that Marshal Joffre said that he desired trained troops sent over there?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I know Marshal Joffre did not say that. He said——

Mr. SHERLEY. He said that in my presence.

Mr. ANTHONY. He said that in four months' time they could do with Americans as they had done with the raw levy of Russians now in France in four months' time. In four months after their arrival they were trained and sent to the trenches, where they acquitted themselves as well as the best soldiers anywhere.

Mr. McCORMICK. If the gentleman will permit, the Russians were trained in six weeks—the raw levies—the marshal told me.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is the General Staff of the Army in favor of the Roosevelt movement?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know what the General Staff of the Army thinks about it, but I know the American people are in favor of this Roosevelt movement. [Applause.]

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Does the gentleman think it would be fair to designate any one man to raise volunteers and allow him to go with them when any other organizations would not be allowed to go?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think it would be entirely fair, and the bill will not designate such a man, as I understand. The pending amendment will not so designate him. But yet there is but one such man in the United States who can so well fill this bill of leadership. [Applause and laughter.] It has been said that it would not be proper or consistent for this House to adopt the volunteer principle in this one instance at this time. I want to remind the House that the War Department itself to-day is adopting the principles of the volunteer system in raising the additional increments in the National Guard in many of the States of the Union. They are being raised by regiments in the different States and in local units exactly as Col. Roosevelt would raise his force of 100,000 men. The War Department is going ahead without authority from this body and is raising nine regiments of technical troops out in the various States in exactly the same way that these additional men proposed in the pending amendment would be raised. There is absolute consistency in the proposition.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I have but a minute more.

I believe that the House would be entirely consistent if it adopted the motion to recommit, trusting to the conference to work out a proper measure back to the House, and it will be reported back without delay, so that the country can have this needed legislation within the next two or three days at the most. [Applause.]

Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] desire to use his time now or shall I use some?

Mr. DENT. I ask the gentleman to use as much time as I have used this morning.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, the United States Senate, with a Democratic majority of 12, passed this amendment to the Army bill by 25 majority. Eight of those Democratic votes represented Southern States. So if a Democratic Senate can give this proposition a majority of 25, there ought to be enough patriotic Democrats in this House to put this proposition over with a united Republican side. [Applause.]

Who are the conferees on the part of the Senate? Three Senators, two of whom voted against this proposition, and one of them failing to vote. So they surrendered that provision, put in the Senate by 25 majority, without consulting their colleagues in the Senate. What have the conferees on the part of the House done? Voted against this proposition when I offered it as an amendment, but failed to give us an opportunity to go on record by a yea-and-nay vote.

Now, the American people favor this amendment. If we are to have no politics in this war, then I appeal to you to give this great typical American, Theodore Roosevelt, a chance to make good on the western front. [Applause.] He was the leader for preparedness; he was the leader for universal military training. Had his advice been followed on preparedness the Stars and Stripes would have been in France 30 days ago. Pass this amendment, and we will have a division of American soldiers in Europe before you complete the census under the draft system of this bill. [Applause.]. O my countrymen, let us forget personal dislikes; let us forget partisanship; let us think alone of our country and its future and its glory. Let us do what we ought to do; obey the voice of the American people. We are here to represent them. Let us do it by passing this resolution. [Applause.]

Why, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] says they obeyed the mandates of this House. Why did he and the other House conferees fail to obey our mandate when we voted unanimously my amendment giving the men fighting in the trenches $30 a month.

Mr. DENT. I answered the gentleman.

Mr. AUSTIN. We gave you a unanimous vote in this House and the Senate gave you one, and yet you are compelling these men from your district and my district to accept $25 a month when the unanimous vote of both Houses favored $30.

Mr. DENT. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. AUSTIN. No.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman asked me a question.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have but five minutes. If I had the time I would let you answer.

I hope every Republican and every patriotic Democrat will vote for this motion. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I notice that those who were the most fervent advocates of the volunteer system have to-day become its fiercest opponents.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. No; this gentleman will not yield. He knows the answer. [Laughter.]

But what difference does it make whether we are consistent or not, provided we do the right and sensible thing? [Applause.] As to this question of politics, there is no more politics in the Anthony motion than there was when William McKinley appointed Joe Wheeler a general in the Spanish War. [Applause.] Talk about politics, if we could rise above politics in those days, rise you above politics now. [Applause.] Since we met at the beginning of April, this House has risen above party politics. To-day for the first time since this session began I have heard the political note sounded.

To those of you who talk about consistency, let me recall the fact that at the outbreak of the Civil War the old pipe-clay idea was gospel to many officers, Union and Confederate alike. When it was proposed in the South to raise irregular troops the pipe-clay men said "What? Shall we have cavalry commanded by irregulars, cavalry whose horses do not match, whose guns do not match, and whose uniform consists of ragged pantaloons and a butternut shirt"? "We want regular cavalry," said they, "and properly organized at that." And they were right. But supposing in following out that sound principle the Confederacy had refused to make exceptions. Suppose that the pipe-clay men had denied a commission to John S. Mosby because he was an irregular? My southern brethren, let me tell you that human nature has not changed since John S. Mosby roamed at will over northern Virginia. Small bodies of adventurous men can still inspire the people. Individual leadership can still exert its old-time moral influence. Men like Roosevelt, even if they are followed only by a handful of adventurers, bring cheer and courage to millions of hearts. As Mosby and his men were to the southern cavalry, which followed Stuart, so would Roosevelt and his followers stand in relation to American Regulars. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Vermont is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I think I realize as keenly as we all do the part that sentiment must play in a great war, and I think I sympathize as keenly as we all do in the idea that there are men in this country whose personality and whose genius for embodying in that personality and their actions something of the most elevating spirit of Americanism is a great asset, a great moral factor in a war. I do not want anything that I may say at this time to be construed as in any sense criticizing the intention of men who in this proposition now want to rely seriously upon those elements for our part in, or at least for a portion of our contribution to, the cause of the allies and our own country in the European war.

But it seems to me that this thing resolves itself more into a practical matter, a most solemnly serious, practical matter, rather than one entirely of sentiment. If sentiment alone is to prevail, then perhaps there might be something to be said of this proposition to recommit. But if we are to be practical men and be guided by the light of experience, then we must take into consideration other factors which, however reluctantly, make us put sentiment for the time being at one side and look solemn and serious facts sternly in the eye.

If there was one lesson of the Civil War which we in this generation should remember, it lies in pointing out to us the necessity for taking the middle ground between two great conditions which arose during that unhappy struggle. They were representative of two extremes. The first was what was known as the McClellan policy of most systematic unreadiness, always waiting until one more stitch was taken, always waiting until we could get a little bit more carefully prepared and organized; and delay in that case, as you know, finally became well-nigh fatal, although it was inspired by the highest impulses and the utmost good intentions. On the other hand, for the other extreme, as older men in this Chamber will remember, we were face to face with that same sentimental cry that echoes in this House to-day, "On to Richmond!" "On to Richmond!" Newspapers, platforms, people all over the country, took up that cry because they thought that if we could once capture the Confederate capital the very sentimental effect of it would be dismaying and terrorizing and demoralizing to our neighbors across Mason and Dixon's Line. But it meant that in the attempt to carry out that sentiment and realize it in war we slaughtered thousands and thousands of brave men whose courage and efficiency might well have been husbanded and put into better effect and operation under some careful, cool, deliberate plan of warfare.

With all respect to the good folks who are making this proposition now, and sharing, as I hope every American man does, something of the tingle and inspiration of romance and sentiment in war time, warfare in modern times has entirely changed. I would like to discuss somewhat in detail the practical military considerations that are involved in this proposition, but I can not hope to do so in the five minutes allotted to me.

It is said that one man, by reason of his personal magnetism and inspiration, could bring courage to the armies of our allies across the water. I ask you in all seriousness, do those wonderful men of the allied nations of Europe to-day who for more than two years and a half have stemmed the tide of Prussian militarism need any lessons in courage from the American people? [Applause.]

I fancy—and I do not mean to discredit their good intentions—I fancy that our friends are asking us, after all, under the color of this proposition simply to write one more romantic novel of the Alexander Dumas "Three Guardsmen" type, that poor Dumas did not live long enough to write for himself. There is too much of the romance and the glitter and the beautiful glamor of that situation about the proposition to make me think it makes for real war. In the language of a celebrated Frenchman in days gone by, "It is magnificent, but it is not war." [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it is utterly impossible for a man constructed on my build to say anything adequate to the subject in three minutes. I expected to get five. [Laughter.] I shall vote, gentlemen of the House, to permit Mr. Roosevelt, and, if I could do so, three or four others like him, to go to the front with volunteers. [Applause.]

I have heard a great deal about expert military training in these debates, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] did well in using Col. Mosby as an example of an irregular command and the great service rendered by him, but may I not appeal to the pride of the Mississippians, the Arkansans, the Texans, and the Alabamians and point to the greatest cavalry leader that was produced by the Confederate States, and no greater produced on the other side, and no greater in the world, Nathan Bedford Forrest, the wizard of the saddle? [Applause.] It is related of Forrest that he said, "I thank God that I never rubbed my back against a college wall." [Laughter.]

I am also at a considerable loss to know how gentlemen will square themselves with their constituents if they now vote against letting Roosevelt and the 200,000 men who want to go with him, go to France, when everyone with common sense knows that you must have men willing to fight to win a war. Here is a division of over a hundred and fifty thousand or perhaps 200,000 men ready to go, within three months, to France. If we do not render the assistance now, it may be too late to help our allies. It is quite possible that if Germany should break through the French line it would put an immensely greater burden upon the people of the United States than we would dream of. Now is the time. This is the hour. Do not delay. Put an army now in France who want to go and you may win the war ere the conscription goes into effect. [Applause.]

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. SISSON. I regret I have not the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SISSON. I say it is quite possible that if Germany should break through the French line this great conflict would be in such an attitude that the Germans would be able to win over France and England, whereas they would not be able to win if at once you can put a few divisions of troops from the United States over there, because a few men at the right time and at the right place, irrespective of what the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] said, might turn the scale.

You may laugh at sentiment in war as much as you please, but the human heart is filled with sentiment, and courage is but a form of sentiment; and what we need at this time in this Nation is to popularize this war among the masses of the people. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. SISSON. Whatever may be said about Col. Roosevelt, and I have no brief to speak for him, never voted for him in my life, never admired his style of politics; but whatever you may say of him, he has a magnificent following in the United States, and in unity you find strength, while in division you find weakness. Let us unify his following and put them also behind the President of the United States and the Regular Army. It is good sense to do it. Let us have it. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this matter is too important to permit any petty partisan influence to affect anyone's vote. We are asked to authorize the President to organize four divisions of volunteers, upon the theory that they will be sent immediately to France in order to bolster up the allied cause. Four divisions of troops will amount to 80,000 men, and the most absurd and preposterous suggestion that can be made is that 80,000 men can in any way bolster up or help upon a battle line where 5,000,000 men are now engaged on the allied side, with 1,500,000 men in reserve.

If Theodore Roosevelt were a man of marvelous military genius, if he had had an extended and comprehensive experience in military matters, if he were recognized as a military man whose advice and judgment would be of value at this time to the allied cause, it would be desirable to send him to Europe at once. Anyone who knows him, who knows his wonderful personality and the great prestige resulting from his marvelous career, realizes that if he were sent as he himself suggested, ranking ninth in the brigadier generals who would go with these four divisions, he would completely demoralize the organization inside of two weeks. [Laughter.] It is not a joke. Any man of his personality, any man with his prestige, ranking not ninth but thirteenth in the list of major generals and brigadier generals, when called into consultation would absolutely demoralize the American forces to which he would be assigned. If it be desirable to send a division of troops to France, we should not take the enthusiastic volunteers who are willing to go because some one particular individual is anxious to go. We ought to take Pershing's brigade. [Applause.] We ought to take a division of the Regular troops, who have been trained for years, and been hardened by discipline and experience, and who could, with a few months' training behind the lines in France, be a valuable force perhaps, if inspiration were desired. But to take a nondescript lot of volunteers from all over the country, officered by incompetent men—and it will take 3,600 officers to officer four divisions—and put them over there in France will be to send 80,000 Americans to sure slaughter. I have talked with a physician who spent eight months in a base hospital in France, and who spent considerable time behind the allied lines. He told me that seven or eight months ago the British themselves were losing 3,000 to 4,000 men every day in ordinary trench skirmishing, because of the absolute incapacity and inexperience of the junior officers who were in those organizations. In order to officer an army of a million men we require 45,000 officers; we must train 27,000 officers additional to those we now have. If we are to take out of the trained officers we have to-day 3,600 of them to send over with this nondescript element, we will commit the most colossal blunder that the American Congress can commit at this time. We should subordinate and put aside the preference of every individual in the United States, and do the things that are essential and best for the American people. No one contends that to send Col. Roosevelt abroad with an untrained force will do so. I wish to express this hope, that if the Congress of the United States commits this colossal blunder of authorizing the organization of these four divisions, the President of the United States will have the moral courage to withstand public clamor, and will refuse to send Col. Roosevelt on such a foolhardy expedition. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. [Applause.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, as the House knows, I supported the conscription policy. I voted against the Roosevelt amendment at that time. But, Mr. Speaker, true consistency demands that each situation be met with but one purpose in mind, and that is to do that which is best for the country at the particular time, and I shall vote for this motion to recommit, because I believe that by a division with Col. Roosevelt going to France at the earliest possible moment, he can render the country the best possible service now. [Applause.] I say that for two reasons, Mr. Speaker. It has been whispered from time to time during the past three or four days that we will very shortly send troops to France, but that they will be untrained troops, because we need the Regulars here to train the army to be raised. Mr. Speaker, if I had believed for a moment that there would ever be contemplated the sending by forced draft of raw, untrained troops to Europe I would have voted against the bill. [Applause.] If we must send untrained troops to Europe, they ought to be volunteer troops, men who are willing to go. [Applause.] And I do not want it upon my conscience in the future that by voting against this amendment now I forced untrained, raw, drafted troops to be sent to Europe to be murdered, as officers have time and again told us would be the case, under such circumstances. I do not want it to be said of me that I voted against this Roosevelt amendment now, and thus forced that thing.

In the second place, there is but one purpose in sending troops to Europe now, and that is to furnish an inspiration to the French Armies now at the front. I had the privilege of listening to Marshal Joffre for an hour and a half one evening, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] did, and he had but one object in view in asking for one division. It was not the fighting that that small division of 20,000 or more men could do. It was the inspiration that would be given to the French soldiers at the front to see the Star-Spangled Banner flying there. [Applause.] That is what he wanted them for, and that is the only purpose, and he did not ask or suggest that more than one division be sent now.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I can not yield. What greater inspiration could be given to the French troops now fighting in the trenches, if we must send men over there, than to have with them Theodore Roosevelt? [Applause.] Ah, some men—I am sorry to say it—say that there is politics involved in this, and when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] suggested that there was no politics involved in it I was very sorry that there were some jeers upon the Democratic side of the aisle. Mr. Speaker, any man in this House who will for one moment permit political considerations to enter into the consideration of this question is unworthy to sit in this House to-day. [Applause.] Politics! Why, what are we on the Republican side of the aisle doing here? Are we not supporting your President in this very bill? Was it not a Republican [Mr. KAHN] who took charge of it and led the fight for it? [Applause.] We are not considering politics. Republicans in assisting the President may give him another term, may mean his reelection; but anything that President Wilson can do, and any glory that he can secure in winning this war, we Republicans are glad to give him, and to assist him. [Applause.]

And let me suggest that there can be no politics in this situation for President Roosevelt. If he goes to France, he will render a signal service to his country; otherwise there can be no politics and no glory in it. If Mr. Roosevelt does succeed in rendering a signal service to his country, gentlemen, ought not you on the Democratic side be as patriotic as we upon the Republican side, and say if there be glory for Roosevelt if he serves his country, let him have it. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the conference report. [Applause.] Having voted for conscription, I feel it my duty to be consistent, and so I shall vote against the motion to recommit. I did not sign the conference report for this reason. It contains a provision which in my judgment indicts the American people of intemperance and immorality. I was willing to write into the legislation a provision which would have given the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army, full power and authority to make all needed regulations for the protection of the young men against the use of liquor and against the social evil. That would have been sufficient. You can not enforce this law in France. You can not enforce this law in Belgium. You write a police regulation into the law, which you can not enforce outside of the United States.

On the other hand, the President, if my suggestion had been adopted, could have made regulations for the American Army in France and the American forces in Belgium. In my opinion the people of those countries would have respected the regulations made by the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Army, and promulgated by his officers in those countries. In that way the evil of intemperance and the social evil could both be regulated.

In San Francisco we had an exposition two years ago. There were 19,000,000 admissions at that exposition. It ran nearly a year. There were only 83 arrests for drunkenness during that entire period. That speaks volumes for the sobriety of the American people, and I will never sign any report which by wholesale indicts my fellow citizens before the whole world of intemperance and of immorality. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN].

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Speaker, when I voted for conscription I voted not for any sentimental reasons but on the basis that universal obligatory service was the only principle that should govern in the raising of an army in time of war. I refuse absolutely to repudiate that principle now. I voted against the proposition to send Mr. Roosevelt to France because I believed that it violated that principle. I believed then that had the Roosevelt suggestion carried at that time we would have been in a dangerous position as to our ability to get obligatory service at all. If you are going to violate that principle, those in favor of universal service naturally will not vote for the violation.

Since the principle of volunteering has been defeated once by the House it is brought up again under another guise in order that they may put across the equivalent of the Roosevelt proposition. The motion to recommit absolutely sets up the principle that instead of universal obligatory service carried out as efficiently as we can, we are going to make a special law for one man. I have the highest personal respect for Col. Roosevelt, but I do not want to see Col. Roosevelt, after he has argued all over the country for universal obligatory service, to be put in a position where he himself is to violate that principle. If we are going to have volunteers, let us have them all along the line; but instead of that we are going to have delay. We have delayed on the bill too long. The only thing which we have passed and which has become a law is our war-loan appropriation of $7,000,000,000. The Army appropriation bill has not yet gone through the Senate. Here we are allowing delay, delay, delay, while the greatest problems that ever faced a nation are still before us. We are spending time questioning whether we will allow a volunteer division for Mr. Roosevelt to go to the French front. The gentleman from Kansas says that he is the only man. Why, what would happen to the United States if the Colonel should die to-night? If we are entirely dependent on one man, I suggest to Mr. ANTHONY that we would better surrender to the Kaiser at once and not risk any further open antagonism to him. I want, in conclusion, to urge that we stand on the basis of the principle of universal obligatory service. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the motion to recommit. It provides that four divisions of volunteers shall be authorized. This will mean about 80,000 men.

The volunteer system has had my earnest support. When the Britten amendment, that provided that only those who volunteered to fight on foreign soil should be sent across the ocean, was considered I voted for it.

When the Dent bill providing for the raising of an army by the volunteer system, the traditional military policy of our Government under which all of our wars have been won, was under consideration I voted for it.

When the amendment containing the provision of the motion to recommit was voted on in the House, I voted for it.

It is very refreshing to hear many gentlemen who were so vigorous in their denunciation of the volunteer system and of those of us who advocated it now so zealous in their support of this motion to recommit, which is a recognition of the merits of volunteerism.

Mr. Speaker, only on very few public questions and matters of public policies have I agreed with Col. Theodore Roosevelt. In this matter of authorizing the raising of four divisions of troops to be sent to Europe I am in thorough accord with him. [Applause.]

Many speeches have been made here and elsewhere in which have been urged the importance of sending an army from our country for the great moral effect that it will have on the soldiers of our allies.

From Viviani and others of the French mission we have it that the presence of United States soldiers, wearing our uniform and bearing the Star-Spangled Banner, over there would do much to hearten and encourage those brave soldiers of France and England who have fought so long on bloody battle fields.

They know that we will furnish food and ammunition, and they thoroughly appreciate that. But they have been told that we are willing to fight to establish democracy throughout the earth, and we should give concrete evidence that we are also willing to sacrifice life itself in that noble cause.

Noble words have been spoken, stately phrases have been uttered, showing why we have entered this great conflict. Let us make those assertions good by sending at the earliest moment a force of as brave men as ever went out to fight for their country.

This amendment is objected to by some because it will give Col. Roosevelt an opportunity to serve in the Army. Already 200,000 men above military age have offered to go with him.

He is a man of tremendous energy, great versatility of talents, and compelling personality. He is not only a national but a world character. His name is a familiar one to our enemies.

Many of our people, many of the newspapers of the country, believe that he can arouse greater enthusiasm than any other man in this country. If so, he ought to be allowed to go the limit, because there is need of greater enthusiasm in this country than now exists if we are to be succesful.

It has been suggested that Col. Roosevelt should not be allowed to go to war because of the fear of him politically. Surely this can not be true. Surely no one would attempt to play politics in this grave hour. To play politics when so much is at stake, when the fate of the Nation has been committed to the gage of battle, would be the cheapest, rottenest politics that I can imagine. [Applause.]

A large part of the press of the country has earnestly advocated giving Col. Roosevelt this authority. I shall include in my remarks an article from the Manufacturers' Record:

NOT TO LET ROOSEVELT GO TO FRANCE WOULD BE A NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL DISASTER.

In all the history of the world there would be no record of anything more spectacular for good than a volunteer army in France fighting for civilization led by a former President of the United States. It is lamentable in the extreme that there is a disposition in Washington to prevent this. If this disposition should work out into reality, it would for all time to come be a blot on legislative action and would forever be credited to politics, and not only to politics but to the rottenest kind of politics that would play with millions of lives and with civilization itself.

Col. Roosevelt is one of the world's great characters. The Manufacturers' Record has criticized him on many occasions, but we recognize that no man whom this country has produced in the last hundred years has stood out more conspicuously before the world as a great character. Spectacular at times, but always filled with tremendous energy, which he is able to impart to others, no other man in America could rally around him such a following of well-to-do volunteers, physically, mentally, and financially, in a position to form a great army for fighting in France.

Col. Roosevelt does not ask to command this army. He asks the privilege from the Nation of utilizing the men who have volunteered to follow him in the organization of such an army, and his plans have been so thoroughly worked out that he would be able to land in France a large army, many of them accustomed to military discipline, all of them picked men, and many of them of great wealth and high position.

There is no record in the world's history of an army which would command such universal interest. It would inspire the people of all of Europe, and, indeed, of all the world outside of Germany and her allies, with joy and enthusiasm, and it would be certain to bring to the leaders in Germany a full realization of the determination of this country to fight the battle of civilization in France.

We can not conceive that there can be men in public life who can have so little regard for human life that they will permit petty politics to influence them in a matter of such supreme importance to this country and to the world. If so, they should be chained through eternity to the Kaiser. Nevertheless, there are indications of rumors that there is such a spirit manifest in places where it should not be felt.

President Wilson would do great credit to himself and good to the Nation and to Europe if he would welcome Col. Roosevelt's activities and bid him and his proposed army Godspeed in the great work of trying to save France. We believe that every intelligent man in this country, as well as throughout Europe, would be greatly influenced by the organization of such an heroic band of men, loving liberty more than life, ready to offer themselves and all of their wealth upon the altar of civilization.

Col. Roosevelt's tremendous magnetic power over men, the readiness with which the cowboys of the plains, the business men in the office and shop, and the banker and capitalist are willing to follow his lead in this supremely important undertaking should deserve universal commendation, and, instead of being opposed, Col. Roosevelt should receive the most enthusiastic encouragement of every man in this country from the President down.

If by legislative action or by the failure of Congress to measure up to this opportunity, utterly regardless of its effect upon the politics of the future, Col. Roosevelt should be denied this privilege or delayed in carrying it out, the blood of many of the millions who may yet have to die in this war would be upon the heads of those responsible for such action.

A little story never before published, so far as we know, illustrates the influence of Roosevelt's name in Europe. Five years ago the Rev. Robert Stuart MacArthur, D. D., president of the Baptist World Alliance, went to Russia on the part of the Baptists of the world to secure the privilege of building a Baptist college in Russia. Dr. MacArthur carried letters of introduction from President Taft, the Secretary of State, and from many other distinguished men in public and private life, and also one from Col. Roosevelt. He was introduced to Russian authorities by the American ambassador. He presented his letters from President Taft and others. They were read with courtesy but with perfunctory interest.

After these letters were read, Dr. MacArthur said that he had a personal letter of commendation from Col. Roosevelt. Immediately there was greater interest aroused, and Col. Roosevelt's letter was eagerly examined. The magic of his name had its effect in Russia to a greater extent than the official letters of the President and the Secretary of State.

In the allies' countries, and even throughout the world, the magic magnetism of his spectacular personality would be of untold worth in this great contest.

It has been suggested that there is a fear that if Col. Roosevelt went to Europe he would return with such éclat as to become our next President.

We can not believe that there is any man worthy to be called a man who would antagonize his going because of politics. The belief that would lessen our faith in mankind to a greater extent than we hope it will ever be lessened, but there is another side to the case even looked at from this viewpoint.

If the Government should deny to Col. Roosevelt the privilege of organizing this proposed army and taking it to France, it is altogether probable, we think, that Col. Roosevelt will individually go to France, and as a private individual, without Government recognition, he would be hailed by foreign Governments and given the opportunity to enter the campaign. The enthusiasm and éclat which would attach to his work when obtained in this way would be greater, even though the military success might not be so great as if he had been permitted to carry his army abroad. In either case Col. Roosevelt stands to win the world's enthusiasm, sympathy, and commendation, while any politicians who oppose his plan will be certain to lose out.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I favor the sending of Col. Roosevelt abroad, because I believe that the American people want him sent, and I think that a decent respect for their opinions and desires becomes representatives of the people. I listened with amusement and some disappointment to the remarks of my colleague from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who said that if the Congress should authorize it he hoped that the President would resist public clamor and pay no attention to it. In other words, we have seated in the House of Representatives from the State of New York a man who wants the President of the United States to stifle and strangle public opinion and public demand. I am opposed to that. [Applause.] The same gentleman wanted to send Gen. Pershing along, the man who could not capture Villa after several months of trial. I appeal to the common sense of every man present whether Mr. Roosevelt would not kill and capture more Germans than Gen. Pershing, and when we have a fight on, let us send a man who can fight, who will fight, and who desires to fight. It was said in the other debate that we did not want to send Col. Roosevelt, I think my friend from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] said, because we did not want to destroy a design or upset a rule. Mr. Speaker, there are always exceptions to all rules. That is an old aphorism, and some of the exceptions are better than the rules, and probably that will be the case in this matter. I say that we can afford to make an exception in Col. Roosevelt's case, because of his character, of his renown, and his record, not only on this continent but throughout the world. [Applause.] He is the best-known American, after the President of the United States, among the masses of mankind, and as a stimulus and inspiration he would be worth 1,000,000 men upon the battle fronts of Europe. [Applause.]

Col. Roosevelt needs no eulogy from me. I do not have to defend his record. His record is its own impregnable defense. He is our greatest citizen in private life; he is the one man among us who is chiseled upon the antique—a figure from the ancient world, if you please—and still strictly up to date in all regards. [Laughter and applause.] We can afford to appoint Col. Roosevelt as an exception to the rule; and if we should do it, every man, every thinking man, every red-blooded man, every patriotic man upon this continent would say amen to the appointment. I favor him for that reason. I favor him because we want imagination and sentiment and the elements of the crusader injected into this war. If you do not know it, I know that there is a strong suspicion, amounting almost to an absolute apprehension, that the Congress has declared a war which the people did not want declared. That may be plain language, but it is a fact; and the trouble with this war is that it is liable to die aborning before we get started. We need the stimulus of some great name, some magnificent personality. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO].

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I shall vote for the adoption of this conference report. I do not, however, want my position to be misunderstood. When the mantle of power fell from the shoulders of the martyred President, McKinley, and rested upon the then practically unknown and untried Roosevelt, there was a cry all over this country that we have a cowboy for President. I was one of the men then who said, "Just wait and see." I have followed his career, I have admired him, and admire him now, although I have not agreed with him on policies at times. I hope the time may come when some of us may have the pleasure of voting for him again for the highest office in the gift of the people. But that is not the question before us now. We can gladly admit the statement that Col. Roosevelt is perhaps the most wonderful man, the foremost citizen of America, but the proposition before us now is a change of the policy which we have adopted after these weeks of study and thought and deliberation, and I think that Col. Roosevelt himself should, with his intense patriotism, be the last man in the United States to ask that an exception be made in his case, an exception which goes to the very heart of the policies for which he has been pleading these many years.

What are the facts? Under the present law President Wilson can commission Col. Roosevelt a major general in the United States Army to-day and send his name into the Senate for confirmation. Under the present law he can place him in command of a division of troops organized, or to be organized, recruited as you will, because the units which are not filled up of the Regular Army and the National Guard are to be recruited under the volunteer system, and these organizations can absorb practically all the material which is now available to fill up this division. What are we attempting to do? Something that you gentlemen know we can not do—dictate to the President of the United States whom he shall appoint a major general in our Army. We may as well attempt to dictate to him whom he shall appoint Secretary of War. I have confidence enough to believe that the President of the United States, well knowing the worth and ability of Col. Roosevelt, will gladly, without any instructions from this House or from Congress, commission him a major general in the United States Army and authorize him under our existing law to carry our flag to victory on the field of battle. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN]. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment if this debate lasts long enough, instead of having performed a great patriotic act in offering to raise a division to go across to the firing line, Theodore Roosevelt will be convicted of having committed a high crime or misdemeanor. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, not as a patriotic Democrat but as a patriotic American I am proud to support this amendment. Who is it that wants Col. Roosevelt to go across? Millions of Americans and millions of those who are fighting the battles of democracy on the other side of the Atlantic. Who is it that does not want him to go across? Oh, I do not want to say that certain Democrats are trying to stop him, but I do not find any great big Democrat in this country who has yet volunteered in the same manner that Roosevelt has volunteered. [Applause and laughter.] Who is it that does not want him to go across?

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. I am told that it is the war lords of the Cabinet who do not want him to go across, and some of the high officials in the War Department. Why? Because they say that he will prove hopelessly incompetent. Say, have any of you tried to get real information from some of these War Department officials since this thing started? If you have, how many really competent men have you found in the whole place? [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] Mr. Speaker, while the applause comes from one side of the aisle, right in here and in here on this side is an echo of my words. [Renewed applause and laughter.] My Democratic brethren have all had the same experience that I have had, and while they do not applaud, quietly they are sympathizing with my words.

Let me say that so far as politics is concerned in this proposition, according to the sentiment in my section of the country, there is no politics in the movement. Up in Massachusetts we are all for Teddy. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, we have seen a curious evolution. Men who were for a pure volunteer plan are now for a selective volunteer plan which has all the vices of the volunteer system and the added vice of discrimination without a reason that can be justified from a military standpoint. I should like to see troops go to France at an early date, and I think they are so going, but to send troops there now that are not trained is to do a hurt and not a help to the allied cause. That exact question was asked Marshal Joffre, and, since his name has been brought in the debate, it is well that the House should have the facts. In my presence and that of 20 other Members of the House he stated in express terms that he did not think it desirable to have troops sent there which were not seasoned troops, and that he wanted troops sent there who after a month's training could be put in the battle front and be of real service. Now we are asked to disrupt all the plans of the Government touching the raising of an army, to hamper all the energies of the Government in equipping and training an Army in order to rapidly equip—not train—but rapidly equip a division that is to be sent across untrained, because this proposal is not to create a division that subsequently may be sent across, but the purpose of it is to permit Col. Roosevelt to have a division that he can immediately take across; and one of the chief arguments is that he will be able to create such a force quicker than you will get it otherwise. Nobody contends that he will be able to create it and make it efficient quicker than anybody else, but what you are asked to do is to disrupt the whole principle that is underlying this establishment and to substitute sentiment for system, to disregard the need of training men and send men abroad who shall not be trained, under the belief that the inspiration of a great name and a great man will be sufficient to make amends for all the defects in the organization and character of the troops you send. I am not concerned in reference to this proposition because it is Col. Roosevelt. I would rather make an exception for him than anybody I know of, but I do not believe we ought to make it for him at the price we will have to pay in so making it. You will disrupt the whole plan for efficiently organizing a force. You will send him over with men who if put on the battle front will not be creditable to America except in their bravery, but will be a handicap; and in the meanwhile the efficiency of the Army will have been delayed and in a measure impaired because of the efforts rapidly to equip this force that ought to go in the regular channels. Let a force of trained men go abroad, either of the Regular Army or of those in the National Guard, that have had a year's service. Let Col. Roosevelt go with them, if need be, but do not undertake to send there a hastily gathered body of men unfit to fight and unfit to be of real service. I know something of some of the men who it is expected will officer it. They are not fit to command men. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE]. [Applause.]

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the motion to recommit, not for Col. Roosevelt's sake, although I admire him, but for our country's sake. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] said a little while ago that the men who are fighting for France and for England have a courage that needs no stimulating. That is true. Their courage has challenged the admiration of the world, but Marshal Joffre insisted that the presence of American troops there would have a tremendous moral effect. [Applause.] So I venture to differ from the gentleman from Vermont. Heroic as their conduct has been they will be encouraged by the presence of an American force, and the evidence it will give that more are to follow.

The stimulus that is needed is a stimulus for the people of the United States, not because there is any powerful opposition to the policies of the Government in carrying on a war which had become necessary and, indeed, inevitable, but because the people, having been led to expect a continuance of peace, have not yet had time to adjust themselves to the new conditions. They have a quiet spirit of resignation to the situation and endurance of its evils, but if they knew the truth they would be full, not of frothy enthusiasm but of quiet determination. With set jaws and white lips they would determine to stand by this thing to the end, to ultimate victory. [Applause.]

No man can stir the people of the United States as Theodore Roosevelt can stir them. [Applause.] His personal qualities draw men to him. He knows the big heart of the ordinary man, and how to appeal to it. This he has proven time after time. Now, a gentleman said to me the other day, "Why not let him go out and make speeches and stir them that way?" It is for the same reason that a chemist can not get a chemical reaction out of substances that he puts together except according to the nature of those substances. Col. Roosevelt can stir the people of the United States because he understands popular psychology. One must understand how people think in order to lead and intensify their thinking. A leader like Roosevelt, organizing even a small division, would arouse the sentiment of the country. Something picturesque, if you will, something striking is needed, and sentiment would be aroused as it will not be aroused by the draft.

I voted for the selective draft, because I believe in it as the wisest and most substantial system for our country. I am conscious of no inconsistency whatever in voting to authorize this volunteer force. If men volunteer who are of ages not included within the draft years, how can that possibly interfere with the drafting system? There is an element largely made up of men who served in the Spanish War or who have had experience in the National Guard or in the Regular Army, and who will not need as much drilling as men of no military experience, but who, as Marshal Joffre stated on the same occasion that the gentleman from Kentucky spoke of—and I had the pleasure of hearing him then—will need to be seasoned on the other side and to learn the methods that have been adopted during the present war. It is not proposed to send this division immediately, but the very process of raising it will arouse the people. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, the debate has developed that this proposition is one purely political, for if this resolution is defeated Mr. Roosevelt becomes a martyr, and he will be a Republican candidate four years from now. If it is carried, they hope to profit by an early termination of the war. The Republicans are endeavoring to use this crisis in the Nation's history to bring themselves back into power from which they have long been debarred. [Laughter.] Now, in proof of that proposition, Mr. Roosevelt himself has stated that he is willing to go as a member of the National Guard. The Republican governor of the State of New York said that he will appoint Roosevelt to any place within the governor's gift, and the War Department has issued an order under date of May 5, House Document 136, authorizing the increase in the National Guard to any limit, which I will read:

WAR DEPARTMENT, MILITIA BUREAU,
Washington, May 5, 1917.

From: The Chief Militia Bureau.
To: The Adjutants General of all States, Territory of Hawaii, District of Columbia, all Inspector-Instructors and Officers in Charge of Militia Affairs, Department Headquarters.
Subject: Organization and entry into Federal service of the National Guard.

1. Under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 3, 1916, Federal recognition will be extended to National Guard units in the various States as set forth in the accompanying table. This table provides for organizations to the extent of 800 men, including the Naval Militia, per Senator and Representative in Congress. The table should not be understood as expressing a maximum war limit, as the number specified is a minimum peace limit which, under the law, was to have been reached by 1921. This recognition of new units will be extended to these units with a view toward bringing the members thereof into Federal service when they shall have been sufficiently equipped to warrant such service.

2. It must be clearly understood by all concerned that the States are not called upon by the War Department to organize these new units. In many States the organization of the additional units will mean an increase of several hundred per cent in the present strength of the National Guard in those States; the expense of recruiting and organizing the new units and providing them with armory facilities will be considerable, and will be a heavy burden for some States with small appropriations for militia purposes; the selection of officers is a matter which should be treated with care and discrimination commensurate with the serious responsibility those officers will have to bear and the important duties they will have to perform. In the present emergency the War Department does not desire to press the undertaking of these burdens upon the States, and believes that troops can be organized as purely Federal forces more expeditiously and with greater efficiency, in accordance with the plan proposed by the President. The law calls upon the States and makes it their duty to organize this number of National Guard troops by a gradual process, giving them until 1921 to complete the task and while the States are not now requested to immediately organize these units of the National Guard, the conditions under which they may be organized and may be extended Federal recognition, and what may reasonably be expected as to entry into Federal service, are published for the information of all concerned.

3. Another point that must be clearly understood is this: Considerable time must elapse between the recognition of a new unit and its equipment for entry into Federal service. The men composing these new units can not be clothed, rationed, and sheltered at Federal expense until they enter the Federal service.

4. Each State should report which of the organizations apportioned to it will be organized and the approximate dates upon which these units will be ready for inspection for Federal recognition.

5 The following will be the conditions under which new National Guard organizations may receive Federal recognition:

(a) The new organizations must be apportioned to the State by authority of the President. (Sec. 60, act of June 3, 1916.) See table herewith.

(b) A State's organizations existing as Organized Militia or National Guard on April 6, 1916, or recognized as such since that date, must first be raised to full war strength. (Infantry company, 150; Cavalry troop, 105; Field Artillery battery, 190, etc.)

(c) Suitable armories and facilities for the care of equipment must be provided for all new organizations.

(d) The members of new organizations shall be so located that the necessary drill and instruction may be had.

(e) There must be some prospect of permanency of organization.

(f) The war strength required for units of the Regular Army (Infantry company, 150; Cavalry troop, 105; Field Artillery battery, 190, etc.) will be required for Federal recognition.

(g) Before receiving Federal recognition officers will be required to pass such portion of the examination prescribed in Circular 13, Militia Bureau, 1916, as may be deemed expedient, which portion will in general include an inquiry into the candidate's antecedents, morals, and character, educational opportunities and qualifications, business and professional experience, conduct, efficiency, and soldierly habits while a member of the Regular, Militia, or Volunteer forces, and his probable efficiency and aptitude for the service. (Par. 10, Circ. 31, Militia Bureau, 1916.) The elementary and professional examination will be completed when practicable. Attention is directed to the qualifications for officers prescribed in paragraphs 2 and 14, Circular 31, Militia Bureau, 1916, which must be strictly complied with.

(h) An inspection by a Regular Army officer will be required prior to Federal recognition. When a State is ready to have an organization inspected report will be made to the Militia Bureau, and arrangements will be made by the War Department, through the department commander, for the inspection. The inspector will verify the numbers and see that all the men presented have been properly examined physically and properly enlisted, and that their general appearance is satisfactory. He will conduct such portion of the prescribed examination for officers as may be required. He will base his recommendation as to recognition upon compliance by the organization with the conditions set forth above. Upon completion of the inspection he will mail his report and recommendations to the Militia Bureau.

6. The State authorities should make requisition for arms, equipment, and clothing for the new organizations raised in conformity with the provisions contained herein. As these supplies become available they will be furnished to the States as promptly as possible. The extraordinary demands upon the Government at this time must necessarily give rise to unavoidable delays.

7. "Federal recognition as National Guard" is entirely separate and apart from a "call or draft into Federal service." The entry into Federal service may be expected to follow Federal recognition when a new organization is sufficiently equipped to move to the mobilization camp and there maintain itself and begin effective military training. Bodies of men can not be accepted into Federal service and sent to mobilization camps without adequate provisions for sheltering, subsisting, and training them. No definite announcement can be made of the exact time that will elapse between "Federal recognition" and "call or draft into Federal service," nor is it possible to announce with any degree of accuracy approximately what this time will be.

8. The National Guard may be "called" into the service of the United States in its capacity as militia for the usual constitutional purposes—to suppress insurrection, repel invasion, and execute the laws of the Union. Members of the National Guard may be "drafted" into the military service of the United States under section 111, act of June 3, 1916, for any purpose requiring the use of troops in excess of those of the Regular Army.

9. To summarize, the duties to be performed by State and Federal authorities incident to the organization of new National Guard units, and the induction of such units into Federal service, will consist of the following:

(a) Selecting localities for various units, designating home rendezvous, enlisting the men, appointing the officers, securing armories and storage facilities. (State.)

(b) Arranging for inspection by Regular Army officers. (State and Federal.)

(c) Extension of Federal recognition (or rejection of organization) as National Guard. (Federal.)

(d) Providing of equipment for sheltering, subsisting, and training of organizations at mobilization camp. (State and Federal.)

(e) Call or draft into Federal service. (Federal.)

(f) Induction into Federal service in accordance with the mobilization regulations. (Special Regulations No. 55.) (Federal, State to cooperate.)

WM. A. MANN,
Brigadier General, General Staff.

Approved:

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

If Col. Roosevelt can stand the physical and mental examination, he can be drafted into his proper place as an officer in the new army and go to France. So that all of this fight is simply politics and there is nothing else in it. [Laughter.] I favor sending a trained army to France as soon as we can get ready to back it up, and I oppose doing anything that will disorganize the President's plans to that end. Certainly I will not lend myself to a partisan political move designed to embarrass the administration. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. NICHOLLS].

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I for one am very sorry that the political question has been brought into this debate. I do not think that it has anything to do with it. I disagree with my friend from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], and to show that politics has nothing to do with it, so far as the Democrats are concerned, I am satisfied that we would be glad if the whole Republican Party would go to France before the next election.

When this matter came before Congress heretofore, and when I was one here contending for the volunteer plan, I voted to send Col. Roosevelt to France. I was in favor of the volunteer system. I still believed that every man who wanted to fight should have a right to fight for his country. But the majority of this House voted that we should have the conscription plan, and to-day, in order to bow to the will of the majority, I can not make an exception of Col. Roosevelt or anybody else. [Applause.]

Gentlemen of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] says that the strongest opponents to Mr. Roosevelt going to France are the men who stood for the volunteer system. I want to call your attention to the fact that the strongest men advocating Col. Roosevelt's volunteer system are the men who stood here advocating conscription in their speeches and by their vote. Those of us who stood for volunteering were forced by a majority of the House to favor conscription. Those of you who voted for conscription are now blindly following those of us who were in a minority on the other proposition. That is the difference in the attitude that we assume here.

Now, I have the greatest admiration for Col. Roosevelt's ability as a leader of men. I have no admiration for his ability as a military man further than the rank of colonel. He has rendered conspicuous service to this country, but he is not fit, and no man can contend that he is fit, to lead a division of troops in a war like that across the water.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. DYER. Is it not the understanding that Col. Roosevelt does not expect to lead a division, but only to go as commander of a brigade?

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Then he is not competent to lead a brigade, because he has never led anything except a regiment, as I understand it.

Mr. LITTLE. Have you got anybody who has ever led a brigade in battle?

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. We have some who have been trained to lead brigades, and I think some of them would do better leading brigades than telling us how to legislate. I agree with you on that proposition. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, one of the definitions of treason is giving comfort to the enemy. While I would not even insinuate that gentlemen opposing this amendment are not entirely loyal and patriotic, for I know you are, but you are steering dangerously near this definition without realizing it, because I am satisfied that nothing at this juncture would give the Kaiser more comfort than to receive a message that Roosevelt is not coming over there with a division of American troops. [Applause and laughter.] More than a decade ago Theodore Roosevelt——

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANGLEY. No; I will not—I can not. More than a decade ago Theodore Roosevelt was warning the country of its unpreparedness and proclaiming that the best way for a nation to preserve peace was to be prepared for war; or, as he would put it, "to speak softly and carry a big stick." If we had heeded his warning and advice then and later, this war with Germany might not have been. After Europe was ablaze he still pleaded for preparedness while others sneered, and to his wisdom, foresight, and courageous course is chiefly due the initiation of whatever preparedness we have since accomplished. And yet in this critical hour, when man power and patriotic sacrifice are so much needed by America, when our allies are begging for our soldiers to come over and help them, and this great and gallant man offers his services, backed by all the magic potency of his name and influence, we find some secret, mysterious, subtle power invading this Capitol to block his way. Gentlemen, it is a situation unparalleled in our history. For the first time in the history of the world a great nation is at war and in need of an army, and yet it is putting itself in the attitude of refusing to accept one unless it is raised in a particular way. Men who want to go to Europe and fight are being denied the privilege, while it is proposed to send those who do not want to go. And all this is being done in the name of democracy.

My colleague [Mr. SHERLEY] made a logical argument against this amendment—he is always logical—but what we need now, my countrymen, is a little less hair-splitting logic and a little more red-blooded American enthusiasm. Remember, gentlemen of the House, we may need in this titanic struggle the volunteer as well as the conscript, the middle-aged as well as the young, and, above all, we shall need the united, enthusiastic cooperation of the whole people. Let me suggest that you had better harken to the voice of the masses, even if you do call it "public clamor," as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] did. It is their war. They must bear the burden. They must make the sacrifices. They must walk down into the valley of death if we win. I say it with deep regret, but I fear that many of us do not fully understand just what is in the hearts and minds of millions of our people—that this war might have been avoided, that you are proposing to place too heavy a burden upon the poor, who are already suffering from the almost prohibitive prices of the necessaries of life, and are not mindful enough of the hardships that poverty brings to so many firesides. Let us not permit the glamor and enthusiasm of war to lead us to forget too much of the human side of it.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it would be a fatal error not to yield to this public sentiment in favor of giving Col. Roosevelt the place the people want him to have in this war. From the teeming millions of this land there comes the imperial demand, "Let Roosevelt go." Already he has pledged to go over 200,000, which is more men than the Government has secured in the same length of time. If it required 1,000,000 volunteers instead of 200,000 in order to enable him to go, I believe they would be at once forthcoming. [Applause.]

It has been contended here that 80,000 troops would cut no figure there where millions are battling. I am for this amendment not alone because of the fighting the Roosevelt division would do but also because of the effect it would have, not only on the morale of the troops of the allies but upon those of the central powers as well. The German Army knows very well who Roosevelt is. Many of them saw him as he stood once beside the Kaiser and reviewed the German troops. They know what his name stands for in a military sense here and throughout the world. They look upon him as the kaiser of democracy; and when they hear that the Congress of the United States has commissioned him to lead against them an American force of volunteers, who come to fight because they want to fight, it will strike terror into the hearts of an already discouraged German Army as nothing else could do.

On the other hand, France and England want our flag and our soldiers over there to plant new courage and enthusiasm in the breasts of their soldiers. What could be more inspiring to them than to have this dashing, intrepid soldier-statesman, twice President of this great Republic, known to all the world as second to none in his championship of all that is noblest and best, both in private and in public life, to carry that flag and lead our men into battle with them! [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I have not always agreed with Col. Theodore Roosevelt, but I have always admired him and never abused him. He did me a personal favor I shall never forget. In the campaign of 1912 I said in my public speeches that Col. Roosevelt had made the most serious political blunder of his life when he left the Republican Party and organized a new one. That he to-day realizes the mistake he then made I have no doubt. But to err is human. No strong and forceful man is free from blunders and mistakes. Roosevelt is no exception. In 1916 he declined the Progressive nomination for President and tried to make amends for his mistake of 1912 by loyally supporting the Republican nominees for President and Vice President. He did that in the face of the fact that he was himself denied the Republican nomination by the same convention that nominated our standard bearers—Hughes and Fairbanks. The point I am driving at is that no Republican on the floor of this House is justified in voting against permitting Col. Roosevelt to go to the trenches of France with the four divisions he desired because he has not always agreed with all the Colonel has said and done.

Neither have the Democrats in this body any real excuse for voting against him. It is true that long before the issues in the last presidential election were really formed Col. Roosevelt had cast some pretty severe strictures upon President Wilson because Mr. Wilson had taken the position that the country was in a state of excellent preparedness. Col. Roosevelt knew how almost totally unprepared we were. President Wilson finally realized it, and realized it, too, that the people were demanding preparedness; so President Wilson turned turtle, grabbed the banner of preparedness, led the procession as its chief spokesmen, advocate, and champion and thereby stole from the Republicans their nice political clothes and robbed them of their valuable political thunder. The stealing of a little political thunder, however, did not put the Nation in a state of preparedness; so Col. Roosevelt continued to preach it and to arouse the people to the need of it. As a matter of fact, he had for many years been warning the country against its state of unpreparedness and proclaiming the doctrine that the best and surest way of preserving peace was to be prepared for war, that to be unable to defend ourselves was an invitation to be attacked. Had Col. Roosevelt's advice been heeded and had President Wilson pursued a wise, steadfast, and impartial attitude toward all the nations engaged in the war, we would not have become embroiled in it, and our citizens would now be enjoying the blessings of peace. I will not at this time enter into a discussion of how and why I think this war ought to have been and could have been avoided. I have expressed my views on that heretofore. Whether we like to or not, we are bound to accept the fact that war is upon us. The question now is how to meet it.

Except as a warning for the future, it does not do any good now to point out the fact that one of the chief arguments for Mr. Wilson's election was that he had kept this country out of war, and that he would continue to do so if reelected.

It does not avail us anything now to review the many blunders of the President which finally involved us into war. If one's house is on fire, the thing to do is to put out the fire. There is ample time after the fire has been extinguished to determine its cause and its origin. The blame for this war will finally be made to rest upon the shoulders of those who ought to bear it. Since we are in it, the thing now to do is to win the war, praying the while that it will soon be over. We ought to take advantage of the first opportunity that presents itself to honorably put an end to it.

The question before this House is whether the young manhood of this Nation between the ages of 21 and 30, inclusive, shall be taken by the throat by the strong arm of this Government—or as many of them as the Government desires—and be forced into the trenches of France to fight alongside the allies for the democracy of the world, or whether the volunteer system shall be given a full and fair trial before resorting to the draft. I am opposed to the draft system. I shall vote for the volunteer plan. I shall vote to give those a chance to go who desire to go and to prevent those who do not desire to go from being forced into it against their will. I shall vote against this bill if the volunteer system is rejected. If the cause of the war is just, the people of our Nation can be depended upon to prosecute it to a victorious end.

COL. ROOSEVELT'S DESIRE TO GO.

When we have a fight on our hands, is it not a good policy to send men along who desire to fight, who can fight, and who will fight? Over 200,000 men have already expressed their desire to go and fight with Col. Roosevelt. He could easily raise an army of a million men. Why is he not permitted to go? England and France have expressed a desire to have our flag flying by the side of their own. They have said that it would greatly encourage their soldiers. Why is not Col. Roosevelt permitted to carry it? Is he not a loyal American? Nobody doubts it. Is not he a fighter from the word go? Everybody knows it. Are not his services needed at this critical hour in our history?

The fathers and mothers, the wives and children, all over this land who are soon to see their sons, husbands, and fathers conscripted for the bloody battle fields of France at least think so. The men and women of our country who are now staggering and starving under the ever-increasing load of the high cost of living, and who are to be still further weighted down under a heavy burden of war taxes at least think so. Every honorable effort should be made to bring this war to a speedy termination. Col. Roosevelt offers his services to this end, and back of the offer of his services is the magic potency of his name and influence, both of which are world-wide and world respected. I am strictly within the bounds of truth when I say that he is our greatest citizen in private life—the best known among the masses of all mankind. His record and renown are not confined to the shores of our own land. They are known throughout the world. If it be true, as many believe, that there is a lack of enthusiasm among our people for this war; that the American Congress has declared a war that the mass of our people did not want declared; and that something needs to be done to inject fervor, enthusiasm, zeal, and life into it, let me ask how better could that be done than by permitting the twice-elected President of this Republic, the soldier statesman, Theodore Roosevelt, to be the first to lead our forces to the firing line with Old Glory floating over the heads of American patriots. This is the people's war. At least they will think so by the time they get through bearing its burdens. The people demand permission for Col. Roosevelt to go. Will this administration throttle public opinion and stifle and strangle public demand?

Is President Wilson a candidate for reelection? I have a firm conviction that he is. I also have a firm conviction that President Wilson and his close political advisers are opposed to permitting Col. Roosevelt to lead an army to the European battle fields for fear that the colonel will cover himself over with glory, come back to this country, and four years hence sweep the President and his party from the political map. But let me repeat that this is now the people's war, whether they wanted it or not; that they have got a right to conduct it; that they are in favor of permitting Col. Roosevelt to go with his army to France, and that he ought to be permitted to go. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, how much time remains on each side?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] has 23 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] 14 minutes.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Kansas to yield some of his time.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I represent a southern district, in western Texas, which is so overwhelmingly and cruelly Democratic that our children would hardly be able to identify a Republican if one should every stray there. [Laughter.] And yet I intend to support this motion to recommit [applause], because I believe that Theodore Roosevelt should be given the opportunity to go to France if he desires it.

A short while ago in my home city of Abilene, Tex., when our people learned that Theodore Roosevelt on his western tour would pass through our town, they made an effort to get his train to stop there only a minute in order that they might pay their respects to a great man. This change of schedule was denied them by the railroad, but, like west Texans, to carry a point 10,000 men, women, and children went down to that depot and stood upon the tracks in a solid phalanx of people [applause] and forced that train to stop in order that they might greet a great American citizen, the ex-President of the United States. [Applause.] It was the personality of the man that caused it.

The criticism has been urged that we are making an exception in favor of one individual. Is there any person other than Theodore Roosevelt who is now ready, now anxious, now clamoring to go to France? It is not an exception, because no other has prayed for the privilege.

I can not agree with the gentlemen on the other side of the House who intimate that Democrats are afraid to let Roosevelt go to France, fearing that he might detract some glory from our administration.

I believe that should Theodore Roosevelt cover himself with all the glory imaginable—and he will do it if he goes—he could not detract any glory from our matchless President and his incomparable administration, for there is enough glory existing and obtainable in both the United States and Europe for at least two great American citizens.

This is no raw recruit who requests the privilege of going to France. He is the only citizen in America who has been not only Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, but also has done actual service for his country at the battle front.

In 48 hours he could get 50,000 brave Texans to volunteer in following him to France. I shall vote to let him go. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. May I have one other minute?

Mr. ANTHONY. I am sorry, but I have not any time that is not allotted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I expect to vote for it. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I shall vote for the motion, for two reasons: First, it will give to the war that enthusiasm and patriotism in America which is now lacking; second, it will give the conferees the opportunity to right a great injustice to the enlisted man. It will give the conferees the opportunity to correct their own mistake and permit us to increase the pay of the enlisted man as the House determined by a unanimous vote. [Applause.]

A few days ago Col. Roosevelt addressed an audience of about 10,000 people in Chicago. Leaning over the railing of the platform from which he was speaking, Col. Roosevelt said, "I want to make good. I do not want to say, 'Go'; I want to say, 'Come, boys!'" and thousands of people, patriotic Americans, rose to their feet and said, "We will come, Teddy!" and I shall permit them to follow their own patriotic desire. It is that kind of enthusiasm that you must raise in every locality throughout the length and breadth of this land if you are going to make this war a success. It is that kind of enthusiasm that you must create in the great financial centers if you would sell Government bonds to carry on the war.

By the unanimous action of this House we fixed $30 a month as the pay of the enlisted man. By the almost unanimous action of the Senate $29 was fixed as the pay of the enlisted man.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I can not. I have only three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GOOD. Canada pays her soldiers, fighting her war, $33 a month. She gives $20 additional to the wife of the enlisted man and $5 additional for every child. Australia and New Zealand pay their soldiers more than we by this report propose to pay ours. America, the most powerful country in the world, the richest of all the countries in the world, following only the dictation of the General Staff and repudiating the instructions of Congress, would, if we adopt this report, which is an insult to this House, an insult to the enlisted man, pay our soldiers less than these smaller and poorer countries pay theirs. We are going to say to the boys by the enactment of this law, "You must go; you will go to jail if you do not go and register for enlistment." You are going to take them from the farms, where they are getting $40 or $50 a month, and say, "You must enter the war; you must go to the trenches and accept the mere pittance of $25 a month."

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. No; I can not.

I voted for the bill. I shall vote for this motion; and if it fails, I shall vote against the bill, because it is the only opportunity I have, and it is the only opportunity you have, to say to those boys, "We were willing to do what was fair; we were willing to pay you for your services in the war at least as much as other countries are paying their soldiers." We owe at least that much to the enlisted man. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I voted for the conscript plan in preference to the volunteer because I wanted to end the odium attached heretofore to the word "conscript" and place every American soldier on an equal plane of honor to start with and let him win his glory by his actions. To have so voted and now to say that I am willing to create a special volunteer class of 80,000 men who, when this war is over, will step with greater pride than the rest of the soldiers who have been taken by our Government and sent to the front is something I will never do. You know that if Roosevelt or any other man is allowed the special privilege to organize volunteers, a privilege denied to all others, when this war is ended those volunteers will strut like turkey cocks over the lesser men who have been conscripted, and you will place the brand of odium upon your boy or mine who was conscripted into the war; and I want to say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and to the gentleman who spoke about arousing enthusiasm here [Mr. REAVIS] that when you have let a few selected men claim the honor of volunteering, you will not increase the enthusiasm of the boy who is left behind and who must be taken by conscription. [Applause.] Let us adopt either the volunteer plan or the conscript plan, and do not let us be lukewarm, for if we do we will be spewed out of the mouths of our people. When men tell me that the country is in favor of Roosevelt going, they simply express their own view. I have heard it so often, "The people are with me." Yes; every man doubtless thinks the people are with him, but my opinion is that the people want to make no pets of any special 80,000 or 20,000 men, to place them in a position above all others, even though led by Roosevelt. Therefore I propose to be consistent. [Applause.] I believe my people favor the selective draft. I do not propose by this special act to crown a chosen eighty or forty thousand soldiers with the glories of a Cæsar's Tenth Legion or Napoleon's Old Guard before they have struck a blow. I want every American soldier to have an equal chance to win glory by his deeds on the battle field and to hand down a proud name to his children.

Mr. DENT. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the situation here to-day is peculiar. There stood on the ramparts in the Military Affairs Committee 12 men who were shot at fore and aft for many days for endeavoring to bring out a bill here for volunteers. [Laughter.] I want to say that the gallant and courageous champion of the volunteer system, the chairman of this committee [Mr. DENT], and 11 others, including myself, came on this floor with the majority report, and fought like men for the volunteer system of raising the Army, and lo and behold, when the record vote was taken there were only 109 who stood with us. We stood for the volunteer system and went down to defeat. After you had, by a great majority, passed the Kahn amendment striking out the volunteer section of our bill, what was the plain duty of all of us on that committee? I joined with my chairman and the honorable Speaker of this House who stood with me for the volunteer provision and voted for the bill. I was against conscription then and am against it now. As the agents of this House and of the American people, your committee stood by you after you had, by an overwhelming majority, voted us down and by the force of your solemn record votes declared there should be no volunteer army, and when on the final passage of this bill you had wiped the volunteers off the face of the earth in favor of conscripts, we were forced to sacrifice our judgment and vote with you, as we were bound to raise the Army. The war must be waged. When you outvoted us volunteer champions, then it was our duty to follow your conscript plan. Do you not know it is your plain duty to stand by your own work? We did succeed in keeping you from conscripting boys under 21 years of age.

I have the honor to be one of the conferees on this great committee that agreed with the Senate on this report that we have brought back here. As a man believing in the volunteer system I had to represent your views instead of my own. I did that service honestly, faithfully, energetically, and patriotically. I know that if the President of the United States had asked Congress to pass a volunteer bill to raise an army by State units, in 36 hours both branches of this Congress, would have passed the bill, and the President would have issued a stirring call for volunteers, and at this date you would have 500,000 brave, patriotic citizens of this country in training to go to France. [Applause.] But you gentlemen who stood up here and bellowed for conscription are now wanting to repudiate your own votes and saying "Let us send one great leader, Theodore Roosevelt, with 80,000 volunteers, over to France." Every one of you know that would disrupt the plans of the War Department and tear up this bill. Where is your consistency? I admit there is little consistency in these days, not even in me, President Wilson, nor the Kaiser. [Laughter.] But many of you men who at first stood against conscription went over to the other camp, and I saw your banners waving in the conscription camp after you had shot us in the back. [Laughter.] Now, since we champions of the volunteer system are men enough to go over yonder in that committee room and agree to stand by this conscriptive draft system that you by your speeches and record votes formed upon us against our will and protests, and which you know the War Department wants, which you know the President of the United States wants, do you not know it is your duty to stand by it, instead of ruining it with this Roosevelt amendment? I say you are waving a red flag in the face of the War Department. You are doing more than that. You are delaying the passage of this bill, and your action will delay too long the raising of the Army for the war. Why can you not stand by the President now, as you pretended to do when you were forcing conscription on us, when you defeated our volunteer provision in the bill? You are offering an affront to the President of the United States, and I believe this House ought to have some respect for its own self as well as great respect for the President. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, the matter under discussion is a most vital one, far-reaching in its influence both at home and abroad. By authorizing Col. Roosevelt to recruit a great volunteer army, to be subjected to intensive training, officered by experienced officers of the Regular Army, and then sent to France, at least two things will be accomplished. First, it will inspire our allies on the front with renewed determination and will carry a message of hope and of courage from the democracy of the New World to the democracy of the Old. Second, it will instill confidence in the hearts of the American people and arouse our Republic to the needs and the necessities of the hour.

The verdict of this Congress upon the pending motion, favorable, as I hope it will be, will cause rejoicing among those who stand with us in the fight; it will be received with joyous acclaim in Paris, Petrograd, Rome, and London, and those rejoicings and acclamations will echo in the trenches, as they are caught up and carried onward along the line when the brave boys, our comrades in arms, hear the gladsome tidings. [Applause.]

Those who advocate the volunteer system for raising an army should welcome the formation of this force; it is consistent with their teachings. Those who advocate universal service—and I am one of them—should remember that even under our plan of selective conscription, provision is made for recruits by volunteers in the National Guard. This proposition only enlarges the National Guard, but it will be a guard that knows neither State boundaries nor local prejudices. It will be a guard truly national in character, for its roll will call the names of men from every State in the Union, and its purpose will express the spirit of undaunted, patriotic, virile Americanism, sounding the bugle that never knows retreat. [Applause.] I hope that this Congress will rise to the occasion and will accept the opportunity offered by the patriotism and the courage of Theodore Roosevelt. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE].

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word in behalf of the most distinguished citizen of my State; one of the most distinguished men in all the world. It is well to keep in mind that we do not rule this country; we are merely public servants. No one man can ever rule this country. The people always have and always will rule this country, and the people want Col. Roosevelt to go to France. His presence there will be a tremendous inspiration to the British and French soldiers fighting the battle of civilization. [Applause.]

We welcome volunteers in the Regular Army, in the National Guard, in the Navy, for engineering service in France, and for the treatment and care of the wounded there. Let us be frank with ourselves. You know and I know that conscription, though the word may be clothed in seductive phrase, is an ugly word for a Republic. We voted for it in the emergency of war, and as an act purporting to be in defense of our country. Yet we all know that conscription is the basis of military despotism, the very thing which we have entered the world war to help destroy.

If the time shall come when the bones of American soldiers lie mingled with the soil of every country from Gibraltar to Petrograd, I would rather, a thousand times rather, see that soil consecrated by the blood of volunteers who through patriotic fervor assume the risk, than by the blood of conscripts forced, perhaps against their will and the wishes of their parents, to leave their native soil to fight on foreign battle fields. [Applause.]

Politics should have no place in a discussion of this question. There have been for upward of three years steady streams of volunteers from the daughters of the British Empire to the battle fields of France. They have there received intensive training within the sound of cannon and the smell of powder, so graphically described by the great marshal of France. What they need there is man power, and they certainly have indicated to us in the clearest manner that if the man power be furnished they will do the rest.

Let the colonel go to France, not begrudgingly, but with our best wishes, and a God speed. In this way, in my judgment, we can best serve the common interests of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID].

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I favor very heartily the motion to recommit for the purpose in contemplation. In fact, I think it would constitute a grave mistake to vote down the amendment. Certainly I appreciate the desirability—I should say the necessity—of expediting the enactment of the pending bill into law, and I would not willingly be the means of unnecessarily delaying this one minute. The bill shall have my support whether amended or not. To pass the amendment does not take from the bill in the least degree; on the contrary, it will add immeasurably to its value.

Ever since the patriotic tender of his services made by Col. Roosevelt for himself and the thousands of other loyal and self-sacrificing citizens who stand willing, ready, and anxious to accompany him to fight in the battle fields of France, it has been my firm belief that the utilizing of such a force would supply one of the greatest necessities for due preparation. It is my candid judgment that a large majority of the American people are desirous that the services of Col. Roosevelt and his following shall be accepted, and I think their wishes should be regarded as a mandate that the amendment be adopted.

Mr. Speaker, I think it will hardly be gainsaid that Col. Roosevelt is one of the world's greatest characters. His knowledge of the different countries and their peoples and his grasp of international affairs is exceptionally thorough. Conspicuous traits in his character are his courage, both moral and physical, combined with the energy and intrepidity of purpose to carry through to the end whatever he may undertake; and in these particulars he would largely typify the following he is promised, composed, as they are to be, of many of the Rough Riders of the Spanish-American War, supplemented by thousands of others whose inherent fitness for the task impels them to offer themselves for the sacrifice.

The opponents of the amendment object that it is politics which prompts the support given it. But let us inquire whence emanates the politics. Does it come from the proponents or the opponents of the amendment? I deplore the mention of the word "politics" in these discussions, and for myself shall endeavor steadfastly to hold my judgment aloof in the consideration of these questions affecting the fate of nations—of any partisan predilections. In fact, I should regard it as both stupid and unpatriotic to allow political party lines to receive any consideration whatever. But here it is pertinent to recall that President McKinley, who attained the rank of captain in the Federal Army during the Civil War, when preparations were being made for the Spanish-American War, did not hesitate to accept the tender of services by the ex-Confederate officers, Gen. Wheeler and Col. Mosby.

Ever since the declaration of war against Germany Republicans and Democrats have joined hands in this House, and one and all have stood back of a Democratic President, and there has not been a trace of partisanship. Why, it was a Republican Member from California [Mr. KAHN] who piloted the selective-draft plan for the raising of an army through this House, because the Democratic chairman, whose official prerogative and province it was to do so, stood for the volunteer plan. If Theodore Roosevelt goes to Europe, he will render signal service to his country, otherwise no glory will ever attach to it.

Important among the reasons for permitting Col. Roosevelt and his following to go to France is that they want to go; and, let me say, I regard the feature "want to go" an invaluable asset. I shall be most glad if all of our armies who may go to France may be composed of those who want to go.

But they say such a division would be incompetent, would do more harm than good, and that instead of adding to the morale of the allied troops and lending enthusiasm that it would dampen the cause to send raw recruits, to be driven like sheep to slaughter. But what are the facts in the case? Many of those who have offered their services have seen service in the Spanish-American War, i.. the National Guard, are a type of men adventurous, courageous, willing to give their all for the cause. Marshal Joffre himself stated to a prominent Member of this House that in the concentration camps of France in six weeks' time raw recruits from Russia were changed into seasoned soldiers. Does anyone contend that the high-grade men who want to accompany Roosevelt to France can not do as well? Roosevelt does not ask to be placed in the highest command. He wants the division to be officered in the regular way, by the best men in the United States Army; and what a body of men it would make! As a matter of fact, this, the greatest of wars, has developed such new methods of fighting as to require special training even of the best-drilled standing armies to qualify them for participation.

The objection is made that it would be inconsistent for many of the Members to now vote in favor of this amendment because in conflict with their votes for selective draft. But let me inquire how this is in conflict with the bill in general, which provides for filling up by volunteers the National Guard and the Regular Army, which a short time ago were lacking to the large number of 720,000. It is pertinent to point out, too, that many of those opposing the amendment were the strongest supporters of the volunteer plan, so that by their own arguments they must admit that they are inconsistent in their present opposition.

Mr. Speaker, it has been repeatedly suggested in the discussions that there is a lack of enthusiasm in this war, and the apprehension of the General Staff and other advisers of the President that a volunteer plan would not secure an adequate army if that system were provided verifies this. All agree that a deeper sympathy and interest in the war is desirable to make it a success.

Mr. Speaker, it is a fact so generally recognized as to have become almost axiomatic that no difficult and great achievement has ever been attained unless the minds of the chief actors at least were imbued with a due proportion of enthusiasm. Why are we contemplating sending an army to France at an early date? It is for the enthusiasm and the inspiration it will arouse, not only at home but abroad. The chief reason advanced by Marshal Joffre and Ministers Viviani and Balfour to the State Department for the sending of troops at once was the effect on the morale of the troops on the battle line in Europe. Imagine the Rough Riders, veterans of the Spanish-American War, reunited under their old colonel, following, perchance, the same flag, carried by the same standard bearer, the divisions filled up and supplemented by others whose patriotic zeal inspire them to offer themselves for the sacrifice, elated by being commissioned to battle in the greatest of wars, this gallant collection, captained by their well-known, fearless, aggressive, heroic leader, will possess enthusiasm, arouse enthusiasm, breed, inspire, and spread enthusiasm at once in America where they are known, and their presence on the battle lines of Europe will be an inspiration to the allied cause, and thus materially help to gain battles and to win the war. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat at a loss to know what to do, since we have not had the official statement from the General Staff. [Laughter.] I introduced a resolution some weeks ago to inquire of the General Staff whether they had accepted the services of Col. Roosevelt, but so far we have had no answer.

I want to reply in the short time I have to the suggestion made by the gentlemen who have been fighting for the draft and who say that we need no sentiment in this country. These gentlemen who voted for the draft say that the people are not for this war. I do not say that now; I said it before you begun the war. We said the sentiment was not for it then, but the people who voted against it are with you now. But when you try to take out all the sentiment that makes life worth living, you take away the prospect of winning the war. [Applause.]

You tell me, gentlemen, that France needs no inspiration! We remember the time in history when France was weak, demoralized, and from a military standpoint dishonored, when a little woman on a white horse bearing the colors of her country gave them the inspiration that led them to victory. She was a volunteer woman. [Applause.] We remember in our own war, when Sheridan was 15 miles away, a demoralized army upon the sight of him on horseback gained a new inspiration, went back, and won the fight. Gentlemen, you took out the inspiration when you forced the American boys to a draft, and next fall when you are shaking dice for the blood of the American boys, as they shook for the garment of the Master at the foot of the cross—next fall when the mother of the boy comes and asks you, "For God's sake, Mr. Congressman, don't make my boy go to fight in the trenches on the soil of Europe," then you will wonder how you can escape the mother's sighs and the mother's tears, when she says to you, "If you had allowed Col. Roosevelt and his volunteers to have gone, it would have been different." You will say to her, "My dear woman, your dear boy has got to go to the trenches in France because we did not want to disturb the plan of draft laid out by the General Staff. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, how much time remains?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas has 10 minutes and the gentleman from Alabama 9 minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we are called upon to vote upon the report of the conference committee appointed to adjust the differences between the two Houses on the bill to temporarily increase the Military Establishment of the United States. We ought, if possible, to vote down that conference report and ask the House conferees to return to conference and endeavor to secure a report more in harmony with the views of the House as expressed in the bill as we passed it and more in harmony with the general opinion of the House as we understand it, but I assume that can not be done.

The report of the conferees is objectionable in a number of respects. First, the House conferees allowed the Senate conferees to persuade them to agree to a provision which only raises the pay of enlisted men $10 per month instead of $15 per month, as provided by the House. The House conferees have yielded to the Senate conferees in the matter of the ages of enrollment and conscription, so instead of retaining the ages from 21 to 40 they have accepted the ages from 21 to 31. The House conferees did, it is true, accept the Senate provision prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors to officers or men in uniform or at military camps or posts, but the provision might have been much broader and given wider discretion to the President to further restrict and prohibit to the advantage of the Army and the country.

The House conferees may have thought they were carrying out the wishes of the House in refusing to accept the Senate amendment which authorized the President to raise by voluntary enlistment not to exceed four Infantry divisions, but in my opinion it will be developed that they did not understand the temper of the House with regard to this matter, and I prophesy that the motion to recommit with instructions to accept the Senate amendment will be carried.

I am loath to believe that political considerations have prompted the administration in its seeming determination to prevent Col. Roosevelt and other popular leaders from raising these forces. If their thought was to minimize the Colonel's influence, they are taking the very action tending to increase it. I am for the proposition because, in my opinion, volunteering is the proper way in which to raise troops and, further, because we need a popular movement such as this to arouse the interest of the people in the great struggle in which we are engaged. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, one does not have to have been raised in the country to realize the force of the old saw that while you may lead a horse to water you can not by that particular process make him drink. It is equally true that while you can conscript armies, you can not by that process alone arouse the enthusiasm, inspire the patriotism, and fire the imagination in the way and to the extent that is absolutely essential to make a great military undertaking successful among a free people. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, we have embarked on an enterprise the extent and duration of which no man can foresee, and for the successful prosecution of that enterprise we shall require all of the enthusiasm as well as all the resources of the Republic. There is no way given under heaven among men whereby the enthusiasm of the American people can be so aroused, whereby they can be so thoroughly brought to that condition where every force of the Nation shall be made effective as by giving to Col. Roosevelt and other leaders an opportunity to call to the standards the volunteers of the Nation with the view of carrying the Stars and Stripes to the hard-fought battle fields in northern France. [Applause.]

I confidently expect the motion for the raising of the four divisions of volunteer troops to carry, and if it does I shall feel it my duty to vote for the bill, even though there are many of its provisions which I do not approve. Unsatisfactory as it is in some respects, from my viewpoint, it will be, if the Roosevelt volunteers' provision carries, so much better than the bill as originally proposed by the General Staff that those who have opposed the more objectionable provisions of that bill have abundant reason to feel that their efforts have not been in vain. At least we shall not conscript the boys under 21. We shall have, if the terms of the bill are carried out in good faith, organizations recruited locally and to a certain extent commanded by local officers, and we shall have retained at least enough of the leaven of volunteering to prove anew that this is the proper way to raise an army among a free people. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I shall support the conference report. [Applause.] We have heard to-day a great deal of argument why Col. Roosevelt should be permitted to go to France, and the burden of that argument is his enthusiasm. I have heard very little argument that his military qualifications would be an asset to the American Army or to the allies on the battle fields of France.

My friends, enthusiasm, unless directed in the proper channels, is more disastrous on the battle field than in any other field of human endeavor. The charge of the Light Brigade was a magnificent thing, but it slaughtered great numbers of soldiers uselessly.

The Congress recently decisively repudiated the volunteer system and adopted the principle of the selective draft as the military policy of the United States. That action denies to many worthy and capable men the opportunity to organize volunteer units for foreign service—men just as patriotic, just as courageous, just as truly American as the distinguished ex-President, for whose benefit the motion to recommit has been made. Yet to-day we are asked to make an exception, to reverse the solemn decision of this House, and grant a special privilege to appease the desire of one man to lead the "first" force to France.

Whatever force that may be organized under the proposed plan, if adopted, will require equipment, will require training, will require arms and all of the various implements and accouterments demanded by modern warfare. To send a force without such equipment will mean disaster to it and prove a liability instead of an asset to the allies. On the other hand, to equip and train such a volunteer force as proposed will seriously interfere with the equipment and training of the armies to be raised under the selective draft, will disorganize and disturb military agencies already heavily taxed, to the hurt and injury of the forces that shall do the real fighting for America.

Gentlemen of the House, it seems to me that if we are to be true to our professed ideals, if we are to interpret aright the spirit of America as it exists to-day, we can not escape the conclusion that that spirit, whether it is in the heart of Col. Roosevelt or in the heart of Col. Jones or in the heart of Col. Anybody-else, ought to impel him to go to the Government and say, "Here am I—not as a major general, but here am I as a private if need be—here am I; send me wherever thou needest me; thy will and not mine be done." [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, a number of gentlemen have asked for time on this side who can not be accommodated, therefore I ask unanimous consent that all Members be given leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the subject of this conference report.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I intended to ask that at the proper time.

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman ask it now.

Mr. DENT. Well, Mr. Speaker, I ask it now, for five legislative days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the conference report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. WHEELER. I voted for conscription and I can consistently vote for the Roosevelt proposition, as I think every Member of this House can. As I understand the proposition that he has made, it is that he will accept no one who is subject to draft—that is, no one between the ages of 25 to 30, but those between the ages of 18 and 25 and from 30 to 45 or 50, who are physically able and make request for admission under the Roosevelt command that would and should be accepted by this Government. Therefore it will not in any way interfere with the selective draft, and if we should need 1,000,000 or 2,000,000 men and all of them should come under the Roosevelt banner, then it would not be necessary to conscript.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I was one of those who supported what is called the volunteer proposition in the organization of an army, which we all believe will be sent to Europe. I have always respected Col. Roosevelt very highly. When he was President of the United States I supported him in his efforts to build a larger Navy and a more efficient Army. I hope I may be permitted to say that I have tried not to be influenced by my political convictions in casting votes of this character.

We are now asked to adopt a provision in this bill which will enable Col. Roosevelt to go to Europe at the head of a separate army. That is the meaning of the section in the bill which has been so much discussed. The section was put there for the sole purpose of allowing Col. Roosevelt to head this army or division, or whatever it may be called. I can not support the proposition. Even though I have never had any military experience, I can easily imagine the demoralization and injurious results which might follow the enactment of this legislation.

As I have said, sooner or later a large army of our Regular Military Establishment will probably be sent to Europe. What reward do the soldiers in this Regular Army expect? Certainly not the poor, pitiful pay they will receive. These men will fight, not for pay but for the honor and glory of the American Nation. That is their only hope of reward. Thousands are willing to go to-day prompted solely by this consideration.

It is now proposed that we shall send two armies abroad. It is not hard to imagine the rivalry which will surely exist. The soldier in the Regular Army will be constantly reminded of the glittering possibilities which might have been his if he could only have been a member of the famous Roosevelt division. Why is it that we must have so much discussion in the House and in the Senate all in the interest of one man? Why is it that everything must give way at his behest? He is not the only patriotic American. He is only one of thousands who are willing to die for their country. Why is it that Col. Roosevelt could not offer his services as other men have done? Why must he have his separate and distinct establishment? He has been a soldier and knows the value of discipline. Why could he not simply tender his services to his country and say to those in authority, "Put me where you think I can serve best." Other men are doing this. Other men just as heroic, just as patriotic, just as brave, are doing this. They will go to the front. Some of them will die for their country, to be mourned by only a small circle of friends.

But all the plans of the General Staff must conform to meet the wishes of Col. Roosevelt. He must be permitted to head an army; with a great blast of trumpets he must be permitted to go to the front. He must be permitted to monopolize honor and glory which properly belong to the rank and file of the Regular Army.

In my humble judgment, Mr. Speaker, it is a proposition not to be thought of. This Congress can do nothing more demoralizing to the Regular Army. This Congress can do nothing more humiliating to those thousands of Americans who are standing to-day saying to their country, "We are ready; take us for life or death; use us as you deem best. We make no requirements; we expect no advertising of our actions; we ask no special legislative dispensation from Congress. Here we are; do with us as you deem best." [Applause.]

It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that politics has entered into the consideration of this section. If so, Col. Roosevelt himself is responsible. He is the first man in America I have heard of who has charged that politics has entered into the consideration of this section. It was he who charged that men were opposing the Roosevelt proposition because they differed from him politically. He himself injected politics when he made that charge. Why did he make it? The answer is plain. He made it because if this section is defeated he can pose as a martyr and could say, "They defeated me because I am not a Democrat." Such a charge is unworthy of a man who has been President of the United States. It is not creditable certainly to Col. Roosevelt.

There are Democrats here who will vote for this section. There are men who honestly are opposed to it. Personally I have always respected Col. Roosevelt very highly. I admire him for his sturdy Americanism. I want to see the country use his services, but I do not want to see his services used to the demoralization and humiliation of the men who make up the rank and file of the Regular Army.

What a splendid thing it would have been if Col. Roosevelt had simply tendered his services to his country. But it seems he can not do things in the regular way. He must have a section written in the bill for his particular benefit. For my part I will not support it. I am for my country. I am for the Regular Army. I am heart and soul for Col. Roosevelt whenever he, in the regular way, becomes an officer of the Regular Army. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time on this side to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to read the instruction that we are going to vote for or against. Gentlemen seem to have forgotten it or to have not read it. This is not politics; it is war. Listen; it reads:

> The President is further authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment, to organize, and equip, not to exceed four infantry divisions, the officers of which shall be selected in the manner provided by paragraph 3 of section 1 of this act.

That is the part of the Senate amendment to which I desire to direct your attention. President Wilson is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. He will be authorized to raise the four divisions, and when raised he will appoint the officers. Oh, they say Roosevelt is to raise the divisions by volunteers. Roosevelt is to be the whole thing. Col. Roosevelt has said, as I am reliably informed, that he will serve in any capacity that he is assigned to. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, we have been patriotic here day after day and week after week, marching up and voting money without limit, putting partisanship behind us, standing together, because it is a time of war, and yet in this House to-day, I am sorry to say, I see, by the laughter and the applause here and there and the jeers elsewhere, that there is politics present here. Oh, you are afraid of Roosevelt! Mr. Speaker, I am not a political friend of Theodore Roosevelt. I did not vote for him in 1912. I never expect to vote for him for President and I do not believe that he is a candidate for President or seeking to forward his own candidacy. Let me tell you, gentlemen, that if you are afraid of him it is more dangerous to leave him at home when he volunteers his services under these circumstances than it is to let him raise the volunteers. [Laughter and applause.] Ah, said one gentleman, he commanded a regiment and did it well, but he does not know how to command a brigade. That may be true. He has had something of experience, however. Gentlemen say they favor the draft, many of them, and others have said, "Yes; I favored volunteering, but I got defeated, and, while I favored it, yet the draft is to come, and therefore, for consistency's sake and for the sake of the Army, the Regular Army, whose feelings we may hurt, we must vote for this conference report." [Laughter.] Gentlemen, those are poor excuses. Let me say to those gentlemen who voted as I did, primarily for a volunteer system, believing that we could get 500,000 of the picked men of this country inside of 30 days, that if the volunteer system was a good thing for all, then in Heaven's name is it not a good thing for a part of it now? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Why, Mr. Speaker, I have not begun yet. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I think I stated when this conference report was first submitted to the House the reasons that actuated the conferees in refusing to agree to the Roosevelt and the Fall amendments, as nearly as I could state the position that the conferees had taken upon those propositions. I repeat now, as I said then, that when this House adopted the draft system instead of the volunteer system it would be absolutely illogical for the House to reverse itself and declare now that the volunteer system ought to be recognized in some form. We have been criticized because we did not follow the views of the majority of this House in fixing the pay of the enlisted men and the noncommissioned officers. I said when that proposition was before the House that we were not in a position to practically pass upon it, because it ought to be considered by a committee that understood the facts.

In the conference we ascertained that if we had adopted the provision as we were instructed to adopt it, a sergeant would get more pay than the second lieutenant who commanded him. We ascertained that a private soldier would get more pay than a corporal under whom he had to serve. Does this House think that the conferees would have been so foolish as to have adopted a provision of that kind?

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentlemen yield?

Mr. DENT. No; I can not yield; I have only five minutes.

Mr. AUSTIN. I desire to correct the gentleman's statement.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman will have the right to correct my statement in his extension of remarks, if he can correct it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have stood, as I have said, for the volunteer system from the beginning. The House instructed me otherwise. That was a question of principle——

Mr. FIELDS rose.

Mr. DENT. I would rather not be interrupted by my colleague. That was a question of principle that this House passed upon—passed up to the conferees—and the conferees carried out the will of this House. If you should adopt the motion to recommit, and send this bill back to conference with instructions on the part of the conferees to incorporate the Roosevelt amendment, because that is what it means—that is the only reason that it is here—it would not be here to-day but for his personality and but for his personal strength in the country—you will delay the passage of this bill. Everybody must concede that proposition. It would not be involved in this bill but for that fact. It is politics, pure and simple. It is a destruction of the plans of the War Department and the wishes of the President. It means a mongrel and hybrid system. [Applause.] It is not carrying out the plan that you gentlemen, by an overwhelming majority repudiating my views, instructed me to carry out.

Mr. FOCHT. I would like to know how the gentleman switched so suddenly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield, and the man who has the floor must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman from Alabama has not switched, and any statement to that effect is as absolutely false as the statement in the newspapers that I am a traitor to my country. I have stood for the volunteer system, but I wanted it to be uniform. I do not propose to give to one man the right, or one set of men the right, to volunteer without giving it to the country at large. [Applause.]

Under leave to extend my remarks I put in the RECORD a letter from the President sent to me to-day. Twice I endeavored to read it to the House, but objection was made. The letter follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 11, 1917.

Hon. S. HUBERT DENT, Jr.,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. DENT: Now that the Army bill has been successfully brought out of conference, I want to express to you my sincere appreciation of the service you and your colleagues have rendered in helping to bring the bill to a final consideration free from any feature that would embarrass the system of draft upon which it is based.

I trust that the conference report may be very promptly adopted. Every hour counts in these critical times, and delay might have very serious consequences.

Sincerely, yours, WOODROW WILSON.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired——

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

Mr. MANN. I do not think that ought to be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. All time has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas to recommit the conference report with instructions.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. ANTHONY and several Members. A division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas demands the yeas and nays. Evidently a sufficient number, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask unanimous consent to read a short letter from the President of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, may we have the motion to recommit reported again? There are many here who did not understand it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the motion to recommit will be again read.

There was no objection.

The motion to recommit was again read.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 215, nays 178, answered "present" 2, not voting 37, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, a motion to reconsider the vote to recommit the conference report was laid on the table.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DENT. Does the result of this vote mean that this whole bill goes back to the conferees of the two Houses?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a joint resolution adopted by the Wisconsin Legislature.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the joint resolution referred to:

Joint resolution memorializing Wisconsin Senators and Representatives to favor certain governmental policies by reason of war.

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That in view of a declaration of a state of war, we hereby recommend to our Senators and Representatives in Congress the following war measures for their favorable consideration, if it should be deemed necessary by the President and Congress:

1. The appropriation by income tax of all yearly incomes in excess of $10,000 for the defraying of the expenses of war.

2. Immediate taking over by the United States Government of all railroads, and their operation under a cabinet department; compensation to be made to stockholders on the basis of the physical valuation of the railroads, said compensation to be paid after the physical valuation has been completed.

3. Immediate taking over of all mines and oil fields and wells and their operation without profit under the Federal Bureau of Mines.

4. Immediate taking over by the Federal Government of all storage warehouses for food supplies; and the enactment of a law making speculation in food supplies an act of treason under articles of war.

5. Dealings between the Government and the workers in all of the industries taken over and operated by the Government shall be conducted through their organizations, with due safeguards for the right of organization among those not yet organized. And be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution, attested by the proper officers of the assembly and senate, be forwarded to the United States Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State forthwith.

EDWARD F. DITTMAR,
President of the Senate.
O. G. MUNSON,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
L. C. WHITTET,
Speaker of the Assembly.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

WAR REVENUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4280.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4280——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion, I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. The gentleman stated the other day that he thought they might close general debate yesterday, I believe, after two gentlemen or more had spoken. Is it the expectation of the gentleman that general debate will be closed to-night or Monday night, possibly?

Mr. KITCHIN. To-night. I believe we can close it to-night.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman from North Carolina spoke five hours and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] five hours——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is not that enough?

Mr. MANN (continuing). In favor of the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, I would not have done it but that it was so hard to make the House understand. Who wants to oppose the bill? Let us see how much time they want.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to oppose it, for one.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do, too.

Mr. MADDEN. I think I can say what I want to say in about 30 minutes. I think it is about time somebody told something about the bill and about the needs of the American people in connection with the taxation that is levied against them. Nobody has done it so far.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think any man who is going to represent the American people ought to have a chance to have all the time he wants here.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the very first one, if he wants to enlighten the House.

Mr. MANN. How late does the gentleman expect to run to-night?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman I have only got requests for about an hour and a half on our side. Let us go until about 5 o'clock and we can have another understanding.

Mr. MANN. All right. Has the gentleman from North Carolina any request to make?

Mr. KITCHIN. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the gentleman from North Carolina that I have requests for 340 minutes, and yet I have stricken off some of the gentlemen who have made requests. Some have come and withdrawn their requests, and several other gentlemen have just now spoken to me, but in the confusion I could not get their names. We can not close debate to-day. I do not see how we can.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us run on, and we will talk about it between 5 and 6 o'clock.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] wants to oppose the bill, and I would rather he would talk on Monday if we are going to have general debate then.

Mr. KITCHIN. Why not let the gentleman talk now if he has got the fever heat?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I have not.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman does not know anything about the bill, to wait until Monday morning will not give him much more time to get further information about it.

Mr. MANN. That kind of talk will not help anything in the House.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] may be able to do that in the Ways and Means Committee; he may be able to drive the members of the Ways and Means Committee, but he ought not to be able to do it in the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, the gentleman knows I am not trying to drive.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has given the gentlemen in favor of the bill the right to occupy the time and he ought to give some of the rest a chance.

Mr. KITCHIN. Have I tried to cut off debate?

Mr. MANN. Certainly; you have.

Mr. KITCHIN. I suggested that we ought to get through.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I suggest that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] speak right now.

Mr. MADDEN. He said that if I did not know anything about it now, I would not know anything about it on Monday. I wanted to speak on Monday, but I do not propose to be driven to a thing. We have had two days' general debate, one day occupied by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and one day by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], both in favor of the bill. No opportunity has been given to anybody to speak to the other side of the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman and to the Chair that I have no disposition to close debate before the gentleman and others have had opportunity for full discussion of this bill, whether it takes Monday or Tuesday. I was taking the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. He said he would yield to the gentleman from Illinois right now.

Mr. MADDEN. Then, when I asked him to do it, he said he could not.

Mr. KITCHIN. I did not know that. I think the gentleman can trust me and the members of the committee not to close the debate without discussion. I would just as soon continue the discussion of it Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday. Go ahead. We will not lose time. It will not cut you out.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, everybody knows that I have been asking for more time. I have not asked to close debate.

Mr. KITCHIN. Sure.

Mr. FORDNEY. Nothing that I have said or done would lead anybody to that conclusion. I want to let everybody talk who wants to talk on this matter, because it is the most important matter we have had for a long time and the most important matter we may ever have again. I am willing to yield time to the gentleman, but I said I could not yield time until Mr. KITCHIN had yielded it. That was my suggestion. I did not want to offend anyone. If the gentleman from Illinois wants to go on on Monday, I am perfectly willing.

Mr. MADDEN. I am willing to say what I have to say on Monday or Tuesday or Wednesday, but I say that those whose constituents are affected by this kind of legislation ought to have an opportunity to speak. Their side has not been presented by anybody, and I submit that this bill, made up without a hearing, without opportunity to any man in the United States to be heard, except the Secretary of the Treasury and anybody whom the chairman of the committee wanted to hear, levying taxes amounting to $1,800,000,000—a sum $800,000,000 more than it ought to be—ought not to be passed without full discussion.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman from Illinois want his time now?

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman can demand the regular order. I will make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. GARNER. I think there is.

Mr. MANN. I think there is not.

Mr. GARNER. Let us find out and see.

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will have to have a quorum, and have a quorum here the rest of the day. I do not think the Committee on Ways and Means has the right to run over everybody. The gentleman from Texas seems to think he is the whole thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is out of order.

Mr. MANN. I do not care whether I am in order or not. I made the point of order that there is no quorum present, and it is the Chair's duty to count.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The gentleman from Illinois is out of order.

Mr. MANN. If the Chair will attend to his duty, I will attend to mine.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the duty of the Chair to preserve order in this House. The gentleman from Illinois is out of order and will take his seat. The gentleman from Illinois is old enough in service to know what the rules of the House are.

Mr. MANN. I do know what the rules are. The Chair will do well to quit lecturing me and do his duty.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will do his duty in the manner he sees fit.

Mr. MANN. Do it now. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and nineteen Members are present—a quorum. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. The Chair says 119 Members are present. That is not a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole. The Chair thinks 100 is a quorum.

Mr. MANN. We have not gotten into Committee of the Whole. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] is recognized.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] if he wants to yield time to some one. If not, I want to yield time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. KITCHIN. Very well. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois afterwards.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman from Ohio want time now?

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, we are attempting by this bill to raise $1,800,000,000. We propose to expend here in this country within the next 12 months in behalf of the United States and its allies the enormous sum of $10,000,000,000, including the $600,000,000 already provided for in the preparedness measures which passed in the last Congress. In all our wars we have not expended one-half as much money as in one year of time will be expended in this country under the bills we have passed and under the other bills which will soon pass.

We are imposing in this bill unusual methods of taxation, burdensome, every item of it, in time of peace. A bill which calls for $1,800,000,000 is the first test of the patriotism of the people of the United States. So far this bill has proceeded without having the support of the newspapers and magazines of the United States, so far as I am advised and so far as I have been able to determine. It is attacked as unscientific in all of its paragraphs, as burdensome, and every interest touched by this taxation, from automobiles to chewing gum, rises in fierce opposition against it.

It did not require any courage to vote for the declaration of war a few weeks ago, but it requires courage to vote for a war measure which carries in it a proposition to which nearly all the newspapers and magazines of this country are opposed. We voted courageously, magnificently, the other day to send the American youth to face poisonous gases in the trenches of France. We are called upon now in this House to resist the gases which flow in this direction from practically all the great newspapers and magazines in the United States.

THE GRAFT NEWSPAPERS AND MAGAZINES HAVE BEEN RECEIVING.

This bill takes away from them a part of the graft they have been enjoying from 1885 down to the present time. We now carry their publications through the mails at a loss every year to the taxpayers of the United States of $80,000,000. We propose to make up a part of this loss. We propose to tax them now, not $11,000,000, as we have in the past, but $30,000,000; and if this bill passes with this clause in it, in spite of their opposition, they will still be enjoying graft to the amount of $70,000,000 every year.

This is a bill that will expire by its terms when this war is over. These newspapers and magazines, almost without exception, have stood for preparedness in the land, for the items in the bills which make up these enormous totals. They stood almost without exception for the declaration of war. They stood almost without exception for conscription in the land, in order that we may make an adequate defense, and now the great majority of them stand for the continuance of $80,000,000 in graft and are opposed to having a graft of only $70,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAINEY. I would like to proceed for a few minutes and then I will yield later on. Nearly all of these papers discuss river and harbor bills and describe them as the private graft of Members of Congress. They discuss the free seed distribution and describe it as graft, which ought to be stopped. It amounts to something less than $300,000 a year. Most of them are opposed to the building of public buildings throughout the land, to the building of public buildings anywhere except in the large cities of this country, where they are published, and they describe the building of buildings elsewhere as graft. Admitting that the improvement of rivers and harbors, upon which any American citizen can launch his boat and carry his goods free of charge is graft, admitting that the building of monumental buildings is a graft, and that the distribution of vegetable seeds is a graft—admitting that these things are elements of graft—these publishers have been getting graft every year put into their treasuries by taxes imposed upon the people of these United States equal to a public building bill every year and a river and harbor bill every year. Public building bills pass this House at wide intervals. It is well known, and the investigations carried on through the administration of two different Presidents of the United States indicate, that if these newspapers and magazines were compelled to pay the cost of their carriage through the mails we could go to a 1-cent basis for first-class postage. In addition to that we could have a river and harbor bill and a public building bill every year if we wanted it, and the money with which to pay for them would be in the Treasury.

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING CO., OF PHILADELPHIA.

Some of these publications have already been mentioned on this floor, and I want to call attention again to the publications of the Curtis Publishing Co. Here is the current number of the Ladies' Home Journal. It sells for 15 cents. Since it has been referred to, I purchased a copy from a newsboy at the street corner yesterday. Two or three years ago Mr. Curtis testified before the Post Office Committee with reference to this publication, and he said it contained 35 per cent of advertising and that the rest was reading matter. That may have been true then; but I have counted the columns here, and the advertising and the reading matter are arranged with such exquisite skill that it is a difficult matter sometimes to separate it. A column of interesting reading matter runs down the center of many of these pages with advertisements on either side, so that the advertisements are next to reading matter and can command the highest advertising price. This magazine—the current number of the Ladies' Home Journal—carries 120 pages.

Mr. ALMON. What is the date of it?

Mr. RAINEY. It is the May number of the Ladies' Home Journal. It contains 120 pages of matter, excluding the first page, which never is an advertising page. Seventy-five pages of this publication consist of advertisements. This last page contains a colored advertisement this week of Kellogg's Toasted Cornflakes, and that page brings them in this week $11,000. There are numerous other colored pages throughout this magazine, which bring this publishing company in every week $9,000 for each such page. These black pages of advertising and these columns in black and white bring in, per page, every week to this publication $6,000. I get these facts from the admissions, before the Post Office Committee of M. K. Curtis, the president of the Curtis Publishing Co., and of Mr. Collins, the advertising manager. This one issue of the Ladies' Home Journal carries this month over $450,000 worth of advertising matter. There are over 2,200,000 copies issued and circulated in the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Not all in the mails.

Mr. RAINEY. This issue of the Ladies' Home Journal is carried through the mails of the United States at a loss to the United States Government of at least $20,000. If this item stays in this bill each issue of this paper will be still carried through the mails at a loss to the United States Government of at least $15,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Now, will the gentleman yield for a minute?

Mr. RAINEY. I will yield for a question, not a discussion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let us take that item——

Mr. RAINEY. No; I will not permit a discussion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How many copies are circulated, did the gentleman say?

Mr. RAINEY. I told how many copies were printed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And we will presume one-half were sent through the mails——

Mr. RAINEY. I can not yield to the gentleman for a series of questions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Just two or three questions.

Mr. RAINEY. I can not yield to the gentleman. I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. RAINEY. The three principal publications of the Curtis Publishing Co. are the Ladies' Home Journal, the Saturday Evening Post, and the Country Gentleman. I do not know what else they publish. They carry the blank paper from the railroad stations to their printing establishment and print these publications and carry them to the post office at an expense to them of $70,000 a year. They pay the Government $600,000 in postage. The United States Government then takes these publications of this one printing house and carries them all over the United States to remote rural routes at a loss to the Government of the United States each year of nearly $4,000,000. Here is the Saturday Evening Post——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SABATH. I think it would be better if gentlemen would hear these statements and this evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I ask the gentleman from Illinois not to make it.

Mr. SABATH. I have not made the point. The gentleman from Washington has made it. He is very much interested, of course, being a newspaper publisher. I presume he wants all others to learn what is going on.

The CHAIRMAN. Seventy-one Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I move a call of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not necessary.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, can not the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended so that he can answer questions?

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late now. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Alexander	Drane	Howard	Rodenberg

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having under consideration the bill H. R. 4280, finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called and 323 Members answered to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that when I proceed with the development of this subject a little further, I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Washington or any other gentleman. I am trying to take as little time as I can, but I do not wish to be discourteous to the gentleman from Washington or anybody else. I realize that this is an important subject.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

At the time the point of no quorum was made I was discussing the Curtis publications. Here is the Saturday Evening Post, which is a Curtis publication. This is the current issue of this publication. I bought it at the corner of the Capitol Grounds yesterday from a newsboy for 5 cents. According to the statement made by Mr. Curtis in 1914 to the Post Office Committee, this publication contained then about 35 per cent of advertisements. Since then the amount of advertising matter has evidently increased, because I find, as near as I can estimate, that the advertisements in here, concealed as they are by reading matter, comprise 69 pages, and there are only 130 pages in all, counting the back page.

Following their practice, the Curtis Publishing Co. publish no advertisements on the front page in the Saturday Evening Post. They, however, publish this week on the back of this paper an advertisement of the Eastman Kodak Co., and for this advertisement in this one issue, on the back of this paper, the Curtis Publishing Co. gets $7,000.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Is the Kodak Co. included under Title VI?

Mr. RAINEY. We are trying to get them on the films. This is one of the great world trusts, and, of course, they can easily pay $7,000 for an advertisement on the back page of one of the Curtis publications.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I prefer that the gentleman will ask his question a little later. For the remaining advertising pages contained in this particular issue, the black and white advertisements, the Curtis Publishing Co. gets $4,500 a page for each issue of this paper. The Saturday Evening Post contains this week at least $310,000 worth of advertising matter. Of course these publications are also news-stand publications. But the Saturday Evening Post each week is carried through the mails at a loss to the Government of at least $15,000. We propose to recoup one-quarter of that loss. That is all.

These Curtis publications—I have not the Country Gentleman here—are high-class publications. They are not as high class publications, however, as the publications of 35 years ago which they are strangling in the land. They will not compare with the Century or Scribner's. They will not compare with that greatest illustrated weekly paper the world ever saw, Harper's Weekly, which has been crushed by this sort of papers.

And yet the Curtis Co.'s products are among the highest examples of magazine literature we have in this country to-day.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. If I understand this bill, there is no tax on the advertisements in these papers.

Mr. RAINEY. No, none at all; we are not trying to get at those in this bill.

Mr. SIMS. There is another provision, however, for taxing advertisements.

Mr. RAINEY. Advertisements by billboards; yes.

Mr. SIMS. Why does it not tax these advertisements in these papers?

Mr. RAINEY. I may reach that a little later. They ought to tax the advertisements.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the Curtis publications are as high class as the gentleman says, is there any reason on earth why you should make the Saturday Evening Post cost 5 cents in Washington, D. C., and, say, 15 cents in the State of Washington?

Mr. RAINEY. Of course. Magazines have two prices—one for the United States and one for Canada.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But I do not live in Canada.

Mr. RAINEY. The magazine that circulates in the United States for $4 a year sells in Canada for $6.50 a year. It is just as easy if they want to add the zone postage to the subscription price—it is just as easy to change the price across the zone lines as it is across the Canadian border.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But it is an added expense to the people in the eighth zone.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; but the less you get of the greater part of this literature the better, even if you are in the eighth zone.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman thinks they are high-class publications for the East but not for the West.

Mr. RAINEY. The people of California or Washington have no right to subsidize and levy a tax upon all the rest of the people of the United States in order that they may get such high-class publications as those of the Curtis Publishing Co.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman propose that such high-class publications as Scribner's and the Century shall cost us an additional price over what it does here?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not propose anything. The only thing we propose in this bill is to make the newspapers and magazines give up a part of the pork they cling to so strong. When it comes to discussing the pork they are particularly vigorous and fluent, but there is no class of citizens in the United States who get the pork that these publishers who issue this character of papers receive.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Has the gentleman considered the matter from this standpoint? I am not so much interested in the publications as I am in the people of the United States and their welfare. Historian Froude once said——

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, I can not yield to Froude; I will yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Froude declares——

Mr. RAINEY. I can not yield.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I will put it in my own language.

Mr. RAINEY. All right; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Only a homogeneous people can successfully maintain a free government.

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, I can not yield for a speech.

Mr. MONDELL. What will be the effect upon the people of the country?

Mr. RAINEY. Upon their intelligence?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; if we establish zones of intelligence.

Mr. RAINEY. I thank the gentleman for his question. I will come to that in a moment. I do not know what these magazines will do. What I think they ought to do if they can not stand it to be deprived of this graft, if it is to be equally distributed all over the United States, and perhaps that is a proper solution, is to increase their subscription price in the East and the West both, so that the East and the West both can contribute to the amount they exact from the people of the country.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman believe that the extra price paid for transportation here will be added to the person who subscribes to these magazines?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not know whether it will or not, and I can not go into a discussion of that phase of it.

Mr. DOWELL. I want to ask another question following that.

Mr. RAINEY. I am only interested in getting back for the Government part of this graft that these newspapers have exacted.

Mr. DOWELL. Just one other question. In trying to raise the rates on these papers, will you not drive out legitimate papers that are not receiving the same advertising as the ones which you have been describing?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not know whether we will or not.

Mr. DOWELL. Then, may I ask one more question?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not think any legitimate paper prompted by the motives of patriotism which ought to prompt all Americans in this country in this hour of our national peril, ought to ask that this outrageous graft be continued longer.

Mr. DOWELL. Can you not reach what you are attempting to reach by getting at the profits of these concerns that you say are receiving such exorbitant prices for advertising, and can you not in that way equalize and not destroy those unable to pay this excessive tax?

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, that does not affect the principle for which we contend. These papers are receiving a subsidy from the Treasury of the United States of $80,000,000 a year, and it ought to end. [Applause.]

Mr. DOWELL. Just one other question.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman will pardon me, but I can not yield now—perhaps later on.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Does the gentleman think that the people of the United States want this subsidy destroyed at the expense of the destruction of some of their best magazines? Do the people desire that?

Mr. RAINEY. We are taxing nearly everybody, and I do not believe that the people of this country want this kind of graft to continue, amounting to $80,000,000 a year. I think the papers and magazines should be satisfied if we give them only $70,000,000 a year, and that is all we propose to give them if this bill passes.

Mr. STEENERSON. How much does the gentleman figure the cost to the Government per pound?

THE HARTFORD GAZETTE, OF WHITE RIVER JUNCTION, VT.

Mr. RAINEY. I can not yield any further now. I want to show the outrageous character of these second-class rates, and I want to call your attention now to the Hartford Gazette. The greater part of the publishers who impose this graft upon the Nation are here in these Eastern States. Here is the Hartford Gazette, published at White River Junction, Vt. That is all there is of it, what you see in my hand. It is a newspaper. It is comprised of two small sheets of paper, four pages, each sheet measuring about 4 by 6 inches. I am unwilling to believe that here in the East, where they have had colleges and schools and great magazines and newspapers for 200 years, that paper is typical of the State of Vermont, but that is a newspaper. It takes 101 copies of that paper to weigh 1 pound, on which the postage would be 1 cent. It goes out into the mail, and they charge 25 cents a year for it. They say they charge that much. It is delivered through the mail.

The Government of the United States will receive only 1 cent for delivering 101 copies of that magnificent weekly newspaper. Why is it circulated? Nobody ought to need this kind of a publication. There is only one advertisement in it, and that is an advertisement of a firm which makes a cleansing jelly at White River Junction, Vt., where the paper is published. It occupies the entire last page. I am not going to give the name of the firm that makes this cleansing jelly, because if they are getting all of this advertising free they are not entitled to any more in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. [Laughter.] This magnificent White River Junction (Vt.) journal goes through the mails and the Government is delivering 101 copies of it for 1 cent, in order, evidently, to carry to the persons subscribing for the paper and those receiving sample copies this advertisement of cleansing jelly and scouring jelly for sale by a White River Junction (Vt.) company in the town where the journal is published.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes more to the gentleman.

THE IRON AGE.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a copy of the Iron Age, a monthly trade journal. It weighs several pounds. This is not a bound volume of a year's publication of this Iron Age magazine, but is only one issue of it. It is a magazine devoted to the iron and steel industry of the country. As I run repeatedly through its pages I do not find anything in it except advertising matter. Of course, there are a few pages of reading matter; and now to my surprise I discover at least four or five pages. There may be more, but it is nearly all advertising matter.

Mr. SABATH. And how many pages does the magazine contain?

Mr. RAINEY. It contains 561 pages, exclusive of the back cover of the magazine which carries an advertisement of a machine company. This Iron Age brings into the Government in postage every year a little over $12,000. That looks like a good deal of money until it is qualified by the statement that this particular issue of this magazine, this one issue, was carried through the mails at a loss to the United States Government of $45,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it fair to make the Pacific coast make up a portion of that loss more than its proportion?

Mr. RAINEY. I have here a copy of the daily Washingtonian——

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAINEY. In just a moment. I have here a copy of the Daily Washingtonian, of Saturday, May 5, published at Hoquiam, Wash. Has the gentleman any connection with this paper?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have the honor to be the principal owner of that newspaper.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes. I want to look through it. Does the gentleman have any objection to stating how much he gets for this page of advertising matter?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I presume on a year's contract the paper gets about 12½ cents an inch.

Mr. RAINEY. Does the gentleman know how much he gets for this entire page?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have not had anything to do either with the business or the editing of the paper for five years. I presume that page would bring in about $21 or $22, of which probably $15 will be paid for the composition and makeup of the advertisement. We pay high wages to printers in the Pacific Northwest, and give them short hours. I will measure the advertisement if the gentleman wishes.

Mr. RAINEY. I find here in this paper that the first page consists of reading matter, the second page has a little over half reading matter; this third page consists of one advertisement and nothing else; the fourth page consists of about three-fourths reading matter, probably four-fifths; the fifth page consists of four columns of reading matter and almost two columns of advertising matter. The sixth page consists of over half advertising matter——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And contains a good many solid Republican truths, by the way.

Mr. RAINEY. The seventh page contains about one-half advertising matter and the rest of the page consists entirely of advertising matter. The gentleman circulates this paper free in the county——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; mostly by our own carriers.

Mr. RAINEY. We still preserve for the gentleman that privilege. This bill still permits——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like the gentleman to give me a moment or so. I want to say that this daily newspaper has never yet rounded out a year at a profit. We make the annual Federal corporation returns, and in eight years' connection with it I have never seen anything but an annual balance in red ink, an Irish balance. It pays a trifling amount in second-class postage. I am not making this fight because I happen to own a small daily.

Mr. RAINEY. I will say to the gentleman this is the first time I have seen his paper.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am proud of the paper.

Mr. RAINEY. It seems to be an excellent paper.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Indeed it is. It is a good Republican paper, and I hope its editor is fighting this system by which you make the West pay extra for intelligence. I believe that a small tax on all mail circulation of all publications is the solution of the problem.

Mr. RAINEY. I will say to the gentleman I am sorry his paper does not yield more return, and I suggest to the gentleman that if he only charges $20 a page for his advertising he is charging too little for a daily paper.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAINEY. I will say the gentleman's paper will still circulate within his county through the post office, free.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. By carrier.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. Are the rates fixed in this bill on the theory that newspapers are to raise the rates of advertising? Is that the theory of the gentleman?

Mr. RAINEY. I have explained several times the theory upon which we drafted this bill. We are trying to get the newspapers to give up just a part of the pork they are getting.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I will.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman has shown a copy of the Iron Age and a Vermont paper. To my certain knowledge, I will state to the gentleman, many advertisers in the Iron Age have themselves established plants in different parts of the country, to meet the competition in that part of the country and sell their goods there, and they have thus distributed their business. Many of them from my section of the country have established plants in Canada. They have not asked the United States Government to carry their products, and if this bill or something to its effect was adopted undoubtedly these papers would establish plants in California and make their publication houses there. They could easily afford to do it. Gentlemen from the West, I can not understand the position you are taking, driving away from your own sections establishments that would be put in those sections where, if this graft was removed, the business would be done there instead of being done in remote sections of the country and transported at an expense to the United States Government. Can not you see the business of it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How many copies of the Iron Age will be delivered on the Pacific coast?

Mr. RAINEY. Who has got this floor now?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. POU. I have a question that I would like to ask.

Mr. RAINEY. I would like to proceed for a moment, and then I will be glad to yield.

In 1875 we charged these newspapers and magazines 3 cents a pound to carry them through the mails. They have been enjoying the present privilege since 1875 of 1 cent a pound.

THE MANUFACTURERS' RECORD.

I have here the Manufacturers' Record, a high-class manufacturing paper, containing the best arrangement of matter I have ever seen in any paper devoted to the industries. This paper sells for $4 per year in the United States; it sells for $6.50 per year in Canada. This particular issue contains 124 pages. and 90 of those pages consist of advertising matter. In letters addressed to each Member of Congress—they have sent each one of you, I presume, a copy of this paper; they sent me one—they object to these zone rates and insist that they will be greatly injured by them. Now, here is a paper which was established in 1882. Here is a paper that was established without the assistance of the 1-cent rate. It probably did not contain as many advertisements then as it does now, but it established itself without any assistance. And I will undertake to say that any price they charged for that paper will be paid. If I was in the manufacturing business or in the contracting business, I would not be without it if it cost $100 a year. I could not possibly do without it. And I understand that this particular company has a daily publication that they sell for $25 a year; and I have no doubt it is worth it. This is a legitimate, high-class manufacturing paper that carries to manufacturers of this country, that carries to the contractors throughout the land, information without which they can not do business, and they will pay what it is worth for that information. And it is worth, in addition to what they now pay, what it pays to carry it through the mails.

COMFORT, OF AUGUSTA, ME.

We are not going to injure any legitimate publication. But here is another one of these New England publications which has sprung up under the 1-cent postage arrangement. This is volume 29 of Comfort, a paper published at Augusta, Me. They publish also at Augusta, Me., Happy Hours, another publication of the same class. Three carloads of publications of this character from Augusta, Me., leave Augusta every day and go to Chicago without breaking bulk, and are there distributed all over the United States by copy delivery. Let me call attention to this magnificent Maine journal, brought into life by the 1-cent postage proposition. I weighed this on the scales down here in the post-office annex—they may not be correct; I do not vouch for them—and four of them weighed a pound. The United States therefore delivers four copies of this paper in California for 1 cent.

Now, on this front page here—you can see it—are astonishing pictures. I might describe some of them. This is the issue for May of this year. This is a war-time issue. You can tell it by looking at this title-page. At the upper left-hand corner is a picture of a soldier dressed in khaki, and with him is a very beautiful young lady. Under it is printed this legend: "The soldier looked at her with a rather bold, admiring glance." [Laughter.] Down here in the right-hand corner is another picture of a soldier—and all of these soldiers have shoulder straps on them; they are officers, of course; they must be in a publication of this kind—and a young lady is sitting in front of him dressed in white; an exceedingly modest-looking young lady, but, without resistance, she is permitting him to hold her hand.

Mr. GALLAGHER. That is "comfort," is it not?

Mr. RAINEY. And under it is printed the legend, "'Don't,' Capt. Edwards said masterfully." [Laughter.] There are four other pictures of like tenor on this first page, which I will not describe.

Now, in order to entertain the gentleman from Washington who insists on this 1-cent postage, and the gentleman from Wyoming and other places, and also gentlemen who live in Maine, who I presume are accustomed to this sort of thing, I want to read some of the literature in this paper. I read from a thrilling story entitled "Nerine's Second Choice." There are four interesting pictures at the head of this serial story which has been running in I do not know how many numbers. We have a synopsis here of preceding chapters. In the right-hand corner is a little picture. An interesting looking young lady is arranging her hair, and another very interesting young lady is seated on a chair near by, both dressed in evening gowns of the mode of the period. I did not know that these fashions prevailed in Maine, but evidently they do. [Laughter.] And standing beside them is a young man, not a soldier this time, but he looks as brave as a soldier, because he is pictured with his mouth puckered up, and under the picture is this legend, "Maurice gave utterance to a prolonged whistle." Is not that an inspiring picture to send to Washington and Wyoming people and deliver at the rate of four for a cent? [Laughter.] This paper, remember, has a circulation of 1,200,000.

Let me read this story at random:

"You don't mean that you don't think he's nice?" questioned Agatha, anxiously.

Nerine winced.

"You are a very lucky girl." Oh! if Agatha would only go away and leave her!

And then just at this point—this writer knows how to keep up the interest; he is an accomplished story-writer of the period—just at this interesting point I read, "To be continued." [Laughter.] And I am unable to give you any further information about that story, but you can all buy the June issue and get some more of it.

"Her Veteran of '98" is another thrilling romance which runs all the way through this magazine, continued from page to page, sometimes continued several pages at a time, so as to get advertising matter next to it, and so that you will have to read this advertising matter whether you want to or not. Let me read from this thrilling story. I think I had better read the end of it, because the way to read these stories which have "sustained interest" up to the very end is to read the end first. And so I will read the last of it so that you can tell what the rest of it must have been which led up to this thrilling, and sad, and dramatic climax. I will read the last stanza [laughter]:

She could not resist his pleading, even had she wished—and she did not.

"You are a man who has been accustomed to conquering," she said, "and I am afraid you would not allow a woman's 'no' to deter you. I expect I will have to submit."

She allowed him to kiss her lips.

[Laughter.]

And so the reader in the West who has had his interest chained by this magnificent, exciting story until the very end, and who does not want to give up this kind of literature, reaches the conclusion, after three hours' reading, that she allowed him to kiss her lips.

Mr. RANDALL. I understood the gentleman to say that three carloads a day were sent to the gentleman's own State, to Chicago?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes. That is the reason I am against this eastern literature. [Laughter.] You may be used to it in Maine and you may like it in Washington, but we do not like it in Illinois, when it gets to Chicago. I never saw a copy there. It is distributed from there, I have reason to believe, all over the Middle West and the West, but I hope none of it gets to my section. I would feel personally humiliated if it did. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But why should the people of Washington be obliged to pay six or eight times as much as heretofore to find out what is in the last chapter?

Mr. RAINEY. I will let the gentleman answer that question himself if he is so anxious to have the circulation of this paper continued there.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. I would like to ask the gentleman if that is the reason why they call the paper "Comfort"?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not know.

Now, I want to read some encouraging news, an encouraging announcement here communicated——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. May I have a little more time?

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman such time as he may desire.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. POU. I would like to hear the gentleman for a moment upon this proposition: There are a number of papers which have built up their circulation by reason of this low rate and which could not continue under a higher rate. If the rate is increased, the poorer class of papers—a number of them, I am told—will be put out of business. Could not the committee provide some means by which the change could be made gradually, so that the poorer papers would not be put out of business?

Mr. RAINEY. We are taking it away from them gradually. We are taking away from them this year only one-fourth of it; and this is a period of war. That is a gradual way of pulling them away from the public teat.

Mr. POU. If this will put them out of business, it is quite a serious matter from that standpoint.

Mr. RAINEY. But my friend will remember that this bill is a serious bill. We are raising enormous amounts of money, and the Nation's life is in danger. Those of us who know what the situation is know that this is true, and while we are compelling young men to go into positions where they will lose their lives, thousands and thousands of them, these men who obtain this subsidy from the Government ought not to insist upon a continuation of it in war times. [Applause.]

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. In a moment. Now, I have some encouraging news for the gentleman from Washington and for the gentleman from Wyoming and these other gentlemen, especially the gentleman from Arizona, because Comfort announces that in their June issue they are going to present special attractions for everybody. They are going to print a story called "Darling Sue," which, they tell us, will be a touching romance of the Arizona frontier, in which the chief actors are a determined woman, a winsome little child, and a chivalrous bandit.

[Laughter.]

I am sure that this June issue will attain a tremendous circulation in the new State of Arizona.

Now, you are no doubt wondering what this magnificent journal costs. You are advised here on this page not to miss the June issue under any circumstances, and they say:

We have got to raise our subscription price in order to meet the largely increased cost of print paper.

That will be an annoying proposition, of course. The subscription price of Comfort is going to be raised. It is going to be, from now on, 30 cents for two years. [Laughter.]

But do not be alarmed, gentle reader. If you will send them 40 cents instead of 30 cents, they will send you this magnificent magazine for two years and an album in addition to it. I do not know what kind of an album it is, but it is an album that goes with this kind of a paper. [Laughter.]

Now, there are other publications from Augusta, Me., of like character, but I could not find them even in the Library of Congress. There is Happy Hours, published at Augusta, Me. I am sorry I have not a copy of it. It is the same character of publication. What a magnificent contribution Augusta, Me., is making to the literature of this country and to the education of the benighted people who live in the Middle West and in the far West! [Laughter.]

THE BIBLE AND THE POLICE GAZETTE.

Here is a book which bears this legend: "Please return to the House of Representatives Library." They are not taking any chances on losing this book, at least. This is the Holy Bible. We carry a ton of that publication to California through the mails for $160.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. From where?

Mr. RAINEY. It is not published in Augusta, Me. It is published in Philadelphia or New York, in an eastern city. We charge $160 for carrying a ton of that publication, with which you gentlemen, of course, are all particularly familiar, to California or anywhere else in the United States. Here is another publication, the Police Gazette. Some States will not permit it to enter their boundaries. Washington does not object to it. We carry a ton of Police Gazettes to California for $20.

Mr. BRITTEN. What was the other price?

Mr. RAINEY. The other was the Bible, and we charge $160 to carry that—a ton of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What size Bible?

Mr. RAINEY. It is a good-sized Bible. If you want to get Bibles to California, buy little ones.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That may not be considered a foolish question, when one considers the parcels post and the book rate.

Mr. RAINEY. This is not parcel post. This is at the book rate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Books go by the parcel post, though.

Mr. PLATT. Books go by parcel post if they weigh over 4 ounces.

Mr. RAINEY. Well, if that goes at the parcel-post rate, then, to California, we charge 11 cents a pound to carry that to California—the Bible.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. So that it was a serious question.

Mr. RAINEY. This particular Bible will probably weigh 2 pounds, if you want one of that size. It takes six of these Police Gazettes to weigh a pound—at least that. We carry six Police Gazettes to California for 1 cent and distribute them there. We can send one of these Bibles to California by parcel post for 22 cents—2 pounds for 22 cents. In other words, we charge twenty-two times as much to carry this Bible to California as we do to carry the Police Gazette to California.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Eleven times as much.

Mr. RAINEY. I am not a lightning calculator—eleven times as much. That is what we are doing for culture in California and Washington.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman had it right the first time.

Mr. RAINEY. I will put it in at twenty-two times as much, and will get an expert accountant to figure that up. I will get it right in the RECORD.

Packages of books weighing from 8 ounces to 50 pounds can be carried by parcel post. We can carry 25 of these Bibles to California in a parcel-post package and deliver them to one address only for $1.04. Under this second-class rate we can carry for this amount 416 Police Gazettes to California and deliver them to 416 different people.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Here is the Christian Herald, a high-class religious paper—one of the best in the land—a religious publication that every man ought to take. It is not denominational. Now, the publishers of the Christian Herald are objecting most strenuously to these rates.

We provide in this bill that religious and fraternal and farming papers, conducted not for profit, shall be carried through the mails at the old rate. I undertake to say that the Christian Herald is conducted for profit. Therefore it comes within the same rule we apply to all these other papers. It carries most valuable matter to all parts of the United States. It carries some advertising; not as much as a paper of its standing ought to carry; but if the culture and the morality and the patriotism of the people of this country are what I think they are and what they ought to be in this hour of national peril, if this company does not feel like giving up its profits and organizing this paper on a basis not for profit, I believe the people of this country would be willing to pay for a paper of this character and standing more than they now pay. The Christian Herald is an institution in the land. People are willing to pay what it costs to bring it to their homes, and those people who are unwilling to pay that do not reach to the Christian standard which the readers of a paper of this character ought to attain.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Should that paper be $1.25 more to the people of the Pacific coast than to the people of the East?

Mr. RAINEY. I can not solve these questions for the editors of these papers.

Mr. HELVERING. Is it not a fact that the circulation is the basis for the advertising, and the advertising is what pays the expense?

Mr. RAINEY. I think the gentleman is correct about it. I think most papers will increase their advertising rates.

Mr. KNUTSON. Am I to understand that the gentleman wishes to put Christianity on a sliding scale?

Mr. RAINEY. I want to put Christianity on that high basis which it occupies in this country, and I am treating this entire subject in that way. You can not make me believe that Christian men and Christian women in this land, in this time of the Nation's danger, want the Government to carry anything to them at a loss to the Government, when we are taxing everything we can tax. Christian people throughout the land are making sacrifices, no matter to what denomination they belong. They are subscribing to relief funds. When we are levying these enormous sums of money to be spent in the defense of our Christian institutions, I do not believe that the Christian people of this land want this bonus to these newspapers to continue.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. If I am not mistaken, the gentleman objects that under the cloak of Christianity some private corporation is making a lot of money at the expense of the Government. Is not that about right?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not think the editors of this paper to which I have referred are doing that, but they ought to pay what it costs to carry their messages to the people.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman will remember that I stated in the committee that the Christian Herald people had come to me and said they were willing to stand a tax on their advertising of 10 per cent, which would more than make up the discrimination in the postage. That paper would pay under that proposition $40,000 revenue to the United States Government. The only trouble is that if you change the postage and leave the discrimination, it does not hit them. They are ready to pay their tax, $40,000 a year. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. I thank my colleague for his contribution to my speech, which confirms my opinion of the high standing of the gentlemen who issue the Christian Herald.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I realize that the gentleman's committee has had a very hard task. I want to ask him if the committee considered at any time the proposition of putting a small tax per annum on the circulation of all newspapers using the mail.

Mr. RAINEY. We considered nearly everything in this connection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Why would not a scale like that be entirely equitable and raise an enormous sum, taxing the little paper for its share and the big paper for its share?

THESE PUBLICATIONS OUGHT TO PAY THE COST OF CARRIAGE THROUGH THE MAILS.

Mr. RAINEY. The Ways and Means Commitee have taken this up, and they agree with the Post Office Committee which has studied this question for years. They agree with the Post Office Department under the administrations of the last two Presidents of the United States, a Republican President and a Democratic President. They agree that these papers ought to pay the expense of carriage through the mails. That is our attitude.

Mr. FESS. There are some papers, like the Christian Endeavor World and the Association of Men, issued by the Young Men's Christian Association, which turn over to that organization whatever profit arises out of their activities.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes. Those papers would pay only the rate they now pay. Religious papers, fraternal papers, and agricultural papers pay the old rates if their profits go to an organization such as the gentleman has described. We realize that papers of that character are entitled to consideration on the part of this Government, where no private individual makes money out of them. The Committee on Ways and Means thought, and the Post Office Committee and the departments through two administrations have agreed also in those conclusions, that such papers ought to be carried through the mails at about the old rates.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is not the gentleman slightly in error about that? Was there not a slight raise of rates on those papers?

Mr. RAINEY. Half a cent a pound. The gentleman is right. We raised them half a cent a pound, a negligible amount. I thank the gentleman for correcting me.

CONTRIBUTIONS OF PRESENT-DAY PAPERS AND MAGAZINES TO EDUCATION AND CULTURE.

Now, in reply to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and to other gentlemen—I hope to close soon now—the gentleman from Wyoming and others also have intimated that these papers and magazines are of an educational character, that in the interest of education and culture and enlightenment throughout the country we ought to continue carrying them at these rates. I refer now to these higher-class papers, not the great bulk of the papers in weight—not to those similar to the magazine Comfort to which I have called attention.

I want to say here, and I think the House will bear me out in what I say, that the thing which makes for education and culture and artistic development in any country is books. Now, if these publications, whether they are of as high class as the Curtis publications are, or of a class not so high, have crushed out the business of writing, publishing, and selling books in the land, then they have not that educational influence which deserves consideration. The thing the world staggers under to this day is the destruction of the Alexandrian library with its 700,000 rolls in the first century of the Christian era. It comprised the rolls—the books of those days—which had been collected for 300 years by the learned men of antiquity. It was the link between the culture, the art, and the education of the modern world, and the culture, the art, and the education of the ancient world. It is gone forever. Whenever you destroy books you inflict a blow on the culture and education and the artistic development of the land which sustains the loss.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

OUR DIMINISHING BOOK PRODUCTION AND THE REASON FOR IT.

Mr. RAINEY. I know what the gentleman is going to ask and I am going to answer it now. I anticipate my friend's question. Now, I want to show what the book production of the civilized nations of the world per capita is. In 1885, when these zone rates went into effect and cheap publications commenced to develop, we were producing each year in this country, per million of population, as many books of all kinds as there were produced in any other country in the world. Now, if our book publications commenced to fall off when these rates went into effect, and as these cheap magazines and newspapers increased in circulation, if after the Sunday magazines made their appearance, books grew fewer, then these zone rates have not contributed to education and enlightenment and advancement in this land of ours. That is the fact. Year by year, with the passing years, the production of books in this country has decreased.

COMPARISON OF UNITED STATES WITH OTHER CIVILIZED NATIONS IN BOOK PRODUCTION.

Let me compare this country now with other civilized nations of the world. Each year Switzerland produces one book for each 872 of population. Japan—and we hardly class Japan with us, you do not do it in California—Japan produces each year one book for each 1,224 of population. Germany produces—or did before the war started—for each 2,000 of her population one book. France produces annually one book for each 3,800 of population. Great Britain produces one book for each 3,800 of population. In 1910, and that is the last year for which I have reliable statistics, the United States produced one book for each 7,295 of her population, and our record is still falling. To-day the only nation in the world that produces as few books per million population as does the United States is Spain. In Spain, instead of having cheap magazines to crowd out her literature, they have bull fights and entertainments of that kind, just as edifying and contributing just as much to her culture as these cheap publications, and she produces for each million of inhabitants only as many books as we produce.

According to this scale of computing the advance of education and culture in the land, according to these statistics, in all the world there is no lower depth than the position the United States now occupies. These cheap magazines, even the better class of them are bad enough, are the weeds growing in the garden which have crowded out of existence the book publication business of the United States. [Applause.]

The figures I have given you are startling. Little Switzerland, one-eighteenth of the size of Texas and one twenty-fifth the size of the United States, publishes more than three-quarters as many books to-day per year as we do in the United States. Denmark, Sweden, Norway have each an output of eight times as many books per million of inhabitants as the United States. Roumania, with only one-thirteenth of the population of the United States, publishes each year one-quarter as many books as are published in the United States. Japan, with half our population, publishes four times as many books. Russia, which has an ignorant class comprising 79 per cent of her population, produces nearly three times as many books as the United States, and has a population only two-thirds greater.

OUR BACKWARD LITERARY MOVEMENT COMMENCED WITH THE ESTABLISHMENT OF SECOND-CLASS RATES.

America's backward movement commenced in this particular with the advent of 1-cent postage in the land. When this law went into effect permitting this stuff and these advertisements to be carried throughout the land and these enormous Sunday newspapers with their magazine supplements to go through the mail, when this law went into effect we had 4,000 bookstores in the United States selling nothing but books, testifying 30 years ago to the intelligence and advancement of the American people. To-day we have less than 1,500 bookstores in the United States, and they are diminishing in number with each passing month.

Talk about 1-cent postage rate with its bastard production of cheap magazines and newspapers elevating the people of this country, raising the standard of intelligence and enlightenment in any section of this country! Face to face with such facts as these, this statement can not be true. [Applause.] It is true, as has been stated, that we produce in the United States 60 per cent of the newspaper and magazine literature in the world, but in the light of such facts as these is that a matter we ought to point to with pride?

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE WEST AND SECOND-CLASS POSTAGE.

The opponents of these proposed rates are circulating a leaflet among Members of Congress calling attention to the statement of a distinguished westerner, our friend "Cyclone" Davis, lately a Member of this House, in which he said on this floor, in effect, that if it were not for the 1-cent postage rate and the resultant circulation of these newspapers and magazines throughout the West, the Indian and the buffalo would still be roaming the plains of the West.

As an indication of the tremendous intelligence developed among the publishers of these papers, they are circulating that statement throughout the membership of this body and throughout this country. These magazines did not begin to develop until 1890, to attain anything like their present growth—shutting out the books of this land—and in 1890 there was not a buffalo running wild in the world. [Applause.] In 1885 the last hostile Indian was dead and in his grave, and yet these magazine and newspaper publishers send that extract from the speech of our friend, whom we all like, to this body as evidence of the fact that they had accomplished the driving of the Indians and the buffalo from the plains of the West and the development of the great West by permitting them to read "Happy Hours" and "Comfort" from Augusta, Me. [Laughter and applause.]

HOW MUCH WE EXPEND FOR BOOKS.

Our ambassador to England, Mr. Page, a member of the publishing firm of Doubleday, Page & Co., before he left for England made the statement that American men spend less money to-day for books than they do for neckties and that American women spend less money for books than they do for the buttons that go on their dresses. It costs, according to a census bulletin of recent issue, three or four years ago, for college textbooks and school textbooks throughout this country $12,000,000 per year. We expend for newspapers alone $280,000,000 per year.

The Flatwoods Farm Journal, published in Hendrickson, Mo., is carried through the mails, 40 copies of it, for 1 cent. It circulates pretty well throughout the United States. I have never seen a copy of the Flatwoods Farm Journal, but I know it is a high-class paper, because they are opposed to this pork, and that is one of the few papers I know of that is, and they are benefited by it more than most papers. The Government takes 40 copies of this little periodical and carries it to its subscribers in all parts of the United States, turns those 40 copies over to the different rural and city carriers, and delivers them for 1 cent. That will not pay the wear and tear on the shoes of one carrier for one month.

INDUCED SUBSCRIPTIONS.

The Ohio Farm Journal is a type of newspaper in the United States having an induced subscription. Men do not subscribe for the Ohio Farm Journal because they want the Ohio Farm Journal. They subscribe for it because they want the premium that goes with it; and the Ohio Farm Journal is a standard farm journal and ranks pretty well up. It sells for $1 a year. That is the subscription price, and the publishers of the paper give to the solicitors from 90 cents to $1.15 for each subscription they obtain. In addition to that, they give the subscriber a premium, which they represent as costing a dollar. It probably does not cost that much, but, admitting that their statement about it is true and that it is worth a dollar, they give from 90 cents to $1.15 in cash and a premium of $1 for each $1 subscription they get. In that way they build up a circulation and send that paper throughout the land. They give in premiums and in inducements to agents over twice as much as they get for the subscription. That is what we call an induced subscription, and that paper circulates throughout the land and carries immense quantities of advertising matter.

The report of the Third Assistant Postmaster General for 1911, on page 39, calls attention to the fact that in the case of one such periodical investigated by the department, with a circulation of 500,000, only 60,000 of the subscriptions were sold to people who wanted to have the paper and 440,000 subscriptions were sold to people who merely wanted the premium—who did not want the paper at all. In the case of another paper investigated under Mr. Hitchcock's administration, a paper with 60,000 circulation, 19,000 of those subscribers bought the paper because they wanted it and over 40,000 bought it because they wanted the premium. In this way, under this 1-cent postage graft, they have flooded the country with these kinds of publications.

THE BANKING JOURNALS.

There are 80 so-called banking journals in the United States; perhaps 4 of them are legitimate publications and ought to live. The rest of them are grafting, leg-pulling magazines and ought to be crushed, and if raising these zone rates defeats the circulation of all of them except four or five or half a dozen, we will have accomplished much for the banks and the lawyers and the real estate men and the insurance men of the country who are being held up and blackmailed and bled by these 80 so-called banking publications.

THE FARM PAPERS.

There are 400 farm papers in the United States. One of them, Successful Farming, carries $600,000 worth of advertising matter in its columns every year. I do not know what its profits are. If these farming papers are conducted not for profit, these proposed zone rates do not apply. If they are conducted for profit, these zone rates apply. The country could get along without many of them.

I want to say, and I must not take much more time, that these statements I have made with reference to the Curtis publications and with reference to these other publications can be borne out, every one of them, by the facts. The Curtis Publishing Co. was requested by the Post Office Committee of this House when they were trying to raise these rates and these publications were fighting the proposition most vigorously, to furnish a statement of the amount of money they received from advertising each year, the amount they received from their news-stand circulation, from their circulation through the mails, their expenses for paper, and everything else, so that the Post Office Committee could tell how many million dollars they were making each year out of this graft. Both Mr. Curtis and Mr. Collier promised to furnish that statement for publication in those hearings. Nearly three years have passed since that time.

If their statements were correct which they made then, they have doubled almost the number of their advertising pages, and they have not kept their promise to this day. I challenge them now, and I challenge all these other publications to show that these statements I am making now are not true. I challenge them to submit to the Post Office Committee of this House, which has these matters in charge, a statement of their earnings and their expenses, to show how much money they are making out of this character of pork they enjoy, or to the Ways and Means Committee of this House, with the promise that we will be permitted to verify it by an examination of their books. I challenge them to make that statement coupled with that permission. [Applause.]

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. DILL. In the light of that fact, does not the gentleman think it will be perfectly proper that the advertising carried by these magazines and publications should be taxed the same as other advertisements?

Mr. RAINEY. I will say to the gentleman that I can not discuss that question now, for I desire to conclude. I thank the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to go into the details of the bill but simply to discuss its general plan. I voted to report the bill. When I voted to report the bill I expected to support it, and I did so because I expect to be able to give the Members of the House good reasons for so doing and good reasons for asking their help to support it.

The bill, considering the circumstances under which the Committee on Ways and Means labored and the time they had, is a good one and I want to say right now that the general plan of the bill is in accordance with sound economic principles and accepted rules of taxation with one single exception and that relates to the tariff provision, and, if I correctly understand the temper of the House, that is one which has met with less objection than any other. I do not want anyone to underrate the difficulties under which the Committee on Ways and Means labored. It was not alone the amount which we had to raise, although the amount was prodigious. If anyone had said here last year that he proposed to raise a sum equal to the amount of our national debt and pay it off with one year's taxation he would have been thought to have been insane or a fit candidate for an asylum for feeble minded, and yet in this bill we propose to raise in addition to the taxes which were already levied, an amount equal to about twice what our national debt was before the breaking out of this war. If anyone had spoken of taking all the cash that was in the national banks by one levy of taxation for the period of one year his proposition would have been thought, before the breaking out of this war, as simply astounding, and yet if we took all the cash in the national banks and all the banks of this country combined together on the 30th of June last, it would only have exceeded by about $100,000,000 what is expected to be raised by this bill. We consider the value of our wheat crop last year was immense, but if we took the wheat crop and took all the oat crop it would not be sufficient to make up the amount which is attempted to be raised by this bill.

The gentlemen from the South talk about their cotton crop, but if we add 25 per cent more to the value of the cotton crop last year it would not equal the amount we are attempting to raise by this bill. The corn crop alone exceeds it by some millions. The amount staggers our comprehension when we consider it; and yet after all it is not a question of the ability to pay, because the resources of this country are so much more vast in comparison that so far as the ability to pay is concerned the country could easily pay it. The greatest difficulties which confronted the Committee on Ways and Means were of a different nature. The problem was, on the one hand, not to take so much of the accumulated wealth and capital of the country as to unduly hamper business and, on the other hand, not to take so much from those who subsist only by their daily earnings as to impose an undue hardship upon them. That was the problem, and let me say at the outset, gentlemen, it was one which was practically impossible to solve with absolute correctness. I want the gentlemen of the House now to understand that anyone who gives his time and study to this matter will come to the conclusion that you can not add at one bound $1,800,000,000 in this country without imposing more or less hardships and more or less inequity upon a large number of people. No committee could do it. It is simply impossible for the reason that it will work so many changes in business conditions that business can not be immediately adjusted to it. It will hit some kinds of business harder than others. It will impose hardships here and inequities there, because business has not time to adjust itself to these changed conditions which will be made by the imposition within one year of such an enormous increase of taxation. But notwithstanding all that, we have presented a bill which is in accordance, as I expect to show, with sound principles of economics and accepted principles of taxation. And I may go further and say, as far as the general plan of this bill is concerned, that it has met and will meet the approval of the broad-minded business men of this country and the best students of economics.

There is in this country, as everyone knows, an association of business men, comprising financiers, bankers, merchants, capitalists, down to the very smallest merchant, known as the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

When it became known that it would be necessary in this country to raise this vast sum of $1,800,000, or, as it was thought at that time, $1,600,000, this association, through its directors, concluded that it would take up the study of this subject and make some recommendations with reference to it. Its board of directors appointed a committee of 12, composed of great bankers, great financiers, great merchants, and men who were known all over the world as authorities on economic questions. These gentlemen prepared a report. They sent it to various Members of Congress. I do not know how many of you received it, but I received a copy while we were engaged in our deliberations. I laid it aside intending to take it up later but overlooked it until we had finished and brought in this bill. When I examined it I was happy to find that the conclusions of that committee, so far as the general plan of this bill is concerned, accorded with the bill which the committee has presented.

At this point I wish to state somewhat at length, but as briefly as I can, the general plan on which this bill was framed.

The first question before the committee naturally was, How much money we should raise; whether we should require this vast sum of $1,800,000,000, or whether we should require a lesser sum and look to bonds or to some other method of that kind to obtain the money? The distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], and also the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], who had recently been having conversations on this subject with the Secretary of the Treasury, told us in the committee just what the Government claimed it needed. It needed this whole sum. I will not go into the details now, because I understand the gentleman from Connecticut will do that later. The military expenditures of this Nation for the next fiscal year were to aggregate $3,800,000,000. You can figure this out from the report of the Committee on Appropriations if you desire. Of this sum there had already been provided the amount of $2,000,000,000 by bonds, leaving about $1,800,000,000 which the Secretary of the Treasury said he must have. Matters have since developed so that, in my opinion, much more will be needed. Now, the question was, How is this sum to be raised—by taxation or part of it by bonds?

Two arguments that were presented, and possibly more, influenced the members of the committee. One argument was—one which doubtless had its influence with some Members—that if at the outset, at our first approaching the question of what this country could do in the way of raising cash to carry on this war, we should hesitate and fail to raise the amount which the Government asked, it would be like turning our hands away from the plow before we had ever turned a furrow. It would be an indication to foreign Governments that the people of this country, and especially its Representatives in Congress, were unready and unwilling to completely and fully support the Government. This argument doubtless had its weight, but there was one which was somewhat stronger with me, and I wish to present it now to the House.

Like the other members of the Committee on Ways and Means, I have been something of a student of economics. In the course of this study I found that every great writer on economics and every school or association of economic writers and students had found and determined that it was a bad policy in war to try to put off as much as possible all the cost of that war upon the subsequent generation; but, on the contrary, the correct policy was to raise as much as practicable by taxation. Gentlemen of the House, we ought to understand the fact that the waste of war falls on this generation and can not false elsewhere or be made to bear elsewhere. The wheat that is lost when a submarine sinks a vessel on the Atlantic Ocean is the wheat that is raised by the farmer of to-day. The shrapnel that is exploded, the powder that is burned, the waste that is caused by taking the young men of this country away from their work and their labors over into foreign countries, or inclosing them in camps on this side, is all a waste of to-day. You can perhaps transfer part of this waste from the shoulders of one portion of the community onto another, but the burden of this great economic waste that is always going on during a war must rest upon the generation which wages it.

The most vigorous complaint against the bill is that it raises too large a sum by taxation, but, as I have said, every economist has held that as far as practicable the expenses of every war ought to be borne by the generation that carries it on. If you fail to do this, you can, by issuing bonds and creating indebtedness, transfer a part of the load from one portion of the community to another, but you simply increase the burden which must be borne by those who are least able to bear it. The reason for this is plain. The issuance of bonds in large quantities always tends to inflation. War itself tends to inflation. A larger tax than any we shall levy by virtue of this bill has already been imposed upon the classes which are least able to assume it, simply by virtue of the rise in prices which has taken place. If we continue to issue bonds in greater amounts than is absolutely necessary, we shall add to the inflation of prices which has already occurred—increase the burden upon the laboring classes both now and in the future. The committee upon considering this question of how much should be raised by taxes finally agreed that we should raise approximately one-half the amount required to finance the war expenses by taxation. And I want to say that upon examining this report of the committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States I find that in the report the same proportion is fixed—that one-half of our war expenditures ought to be so raised.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. RAMSEYER. We have issued or authorized $2,000,000,000 of bonds for ourselves and $2,000,000,000 in certificates.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The certificates are not to carry on the war but to supply a temporary deficit in the Treasury.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The question I was going to ask was, Is it the purpose of the Government to take up the certificates or do away with the certificates by this taxation?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is expected that the certificates will be taken up.

Mr. RAMSEYER. By this tax in the bill?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GARLAND. I wanted to ask this question: Why, in the case of war, should a different idea of financing occur from that of every-day life in every city and every borough? Is it not a fact that in every city where they want to make improvements, something lasting, something that will require a lot of money, they issue bonds, and they arrange a sinking fund to meet those bonds in the future?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is making an argument——

Mr. GARLAND. No. I simply ask why a different policy is adopted in time of war.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have given one reason, but will give you another. Because the bonds you mention are issued for improvements, and when you issue them you have got the project, the public improvement, or whatever it is. You have property to show for your bonds which will benefit those who come after us. But when you issue bonds for war purposes you have nothing to show for them, nothing to hand down to future generations or to carry as capital. That is the difference.

Now, then, having determined, as the committee did, that it would raise one-half the amount required for war purposes by taxation, the next question was, What kind of taxation should be used, and how should it be proportioned?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will permit, the committee did not determine to raise one-half of all the war expenses, but only for the next year.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I meant only that and accept the correction.

The next question was, How shall these taxes be proportioned? The committee determined on that point that they would raise approximately 50 per cent of this amount on what we might call "accumulated wealth," for want of a better term; it is the only way I can designate it at this particular time—and the other one-half by excise taxes or taxes of a similar class. Upon examining the report which was issued by the National Chamber of Commerce I find that that plan also was agreed upon by this committee of great bankers and great financiers and great economists—to raise about one-half of the sum required by these taxes on surplus or accumulated wealth.

Now, what was this amount to be apportioned on surplus wealth and how was it to be raised? We agreed it should be raised by virtue of the income tax and the excess profits tax, and in this report of the chamber of commerce that I have here it was recommended that $400,000,000 should be raised by an additional tax on personal incomes. If anybody will undertake to figure it out from our bill, you will find that that is about the amount fixed for the additional income tax on personal incomes. The rest of it we put on the increase of surplus wealth, as I call it, by means of the tax on the profits of corporations and the excess profits tax. Taking these three together, the individual income tax, the tax on the profits of corporations—commonly called the corporation income tax—and the excess profits tax, we have very nearly one-half of the amount that we proposed to raise.

Then, the next question arises in relation to the excess profits tax. We doubled the excess profits tax and, as I understand, many gentlemen are complaining because it was made so high. I find by examination of this report that this committee of bankers and financiers recommended $200,000,000 to be raised by the excess profits tax. This is just exactly the sum that the Committee on Ways and Means determined to raise by that method. Evidently the committee appointed by the National Chamber of Commerce concluded that the concerns which are now making an extraordinary profit could afford to pay this extra sum of $200,000,000. If they admit this amount is not too large, surely no one else ought to complain.

For myself, I must say that I think it ought to have been larger. It seems to me that the excess profits tax is one of the fairest taxes that can be laid, for it requires funds only from those whose good fortune makes it easy for them to pay. I have stated that I approve of the general plan of the bill, but I do not mean thereby that I approve of every detail of it. I not only think the excess profits tax ought to be larger, but I think it also ought to be made applicable to individuals who are engaged in trade and business. This would be simply fair and just. We raised $200,000,000 without its being levied upon individuals. Had it also been levied upon individuals engaged in trade and business, we could have raised from $35,000,000 to $40,000,000 more without, I think, doing any injustice to anyone.

They say that this tax is excessive, and some Members of the House have criticized it, yet Great Britain raised for the year ending March 31 last about $700,000,000 from this source alone. That country started with an excess profits tax of 50 per cent, increased it to 60 per cent, and in the present budget recently proposed in Parliament it is fixed at 80 per cent, and still business goes on in England, and will continue.

Having reached this point and determined how much should be raised from income tax, corporation tax, and excess profits, the committee next took up the subject of how to raise the balance. Obviously it must be raised by excise taxes, but on what? The committee determined, and very properly I think, that these taxes should first be levied upon luxuries; and I believe that no Member of the House will disagree with the committee as to that proposition. Luxuries ought to be taxed, and taxed heavily, before any tax is levied which will add to the necessities of life and which must affect the laboring classes and everyone throughout the land, regardless of his position or estate. In passing upon the tax upon luxuries, we divided the articles to be taxed, roughly speaking, into two classes—one which might be called luxuries pure and simple, such as intoxicating liquor and tobacco, and those which might be called near-luxuries, to some of which we have been so accustomed that they are often regarded as necessities.

So far as intoxicating liquors are concerned, the majority of the committee felt that a tax should be laid at the point where it would produce the most revenue, and it was fixed accordingly. In the judgment of the committee if it was made any higher it would produce less revenue rather than more.

We taxed the tires and tubes on automobiles in order to reach not only the automobiles which are now being manufactured, but those which are actually in use. We also taxed musical instruments, motion-picture films, sporting goods, cosmetics, proprietary medicines, and chewing gum, all of which are, as we believe, in the nature of luxuries and which can properly bear a heavy tax.

Objection has been made to taxes upon these articles, because in most instances they are levied upon the gross sales of the manufacturer, regardless of whether he has made any profit or not, and objection has also been made on the claim that some of these articles are not luxuries at all. I shall not stop to discuss the last point, but I want to say that the objections that I have heard made so far in the debate have been based upon an altogether wrong impression. Members talk as though the manufacturer were the one who would lose by this tax. The manufacturer will pay it in the first instance, but whenever you put a tax on luxuries, it will never be paid by the manufacturer, but by the ultimate consumer, because the man who can afford a luxury can afford to pay a little more for it, and will continue to buy it. It may make the sales a little smaller, but the effect will be slight. We have been deluged by protests through telegrams from every manufacturer affected by this bill, in fact by nearly everyone who is affected by the bill at all. They are piled so high in my office that I will need some addition to it soon in order to take care of them.

Gentlemen are now before the Senate committee, as I understand, who represent the liquor and tobacco business, claiming that their business will be absolutely ruined if these taxes are imposed in accordance with the bill. Do you suppose that any of these manufacturers of liquor or tobacco are going to pay this tax in the long run? Not one of them. They will simply add the tax to the price, and there will be practically as much liquor consumed and practically as much tobacco consumed. The manufacturer of tobacco has already arranged to take care of the tax. In making up their packages of cigarettes or smoking tobacco there will be enough less to make up for it, and it will be the same way with cigars.

As some gentlemen have claimed that a tax of 5 per cent on the gross receipts of the manufacturer will ruin any business, because it would be more than their profits, I would like to call their attention to the fact that before we commenced to tax spirits and tobacco they were already taxed not merely several times the amount of the manufacturer's profit, but in many cases more than 100 per cent on the manufacturer's cost, yet business in these lines has prospered amazingly.

It costs less than 50 cents a gallon to manufacture alcohol, and by this bill we raised this tax to $2.25. I have not heard any Member say that the business would not continue, but they insist that a 5 per cent tax on the gross sales of automobiles will put the manufacturer out of business.

We have added in this bill a provision which requires the payment of a higher rate of postage on second-class matter. I fully agree that more should be paid to the Government for advertising matter that passes through the mails. I can not say, however, that I think the plan adopted was the best. In justice to the majority of the committee it ought to be said, however, that this provision of the bill was not regarded as a tax at all, but simply a method of obtaining for the Government a greater proportion—that is, about 20 per cent or 25 per cent of the loss which it is now sustaining on the present rates, which they regarded in the nature of a subsidy to the newspapers and periodicals.

After all of these taxes were determined we were still short of the amount required to be raised, and it was evident that unless we still further raised the income and excess profits tax some taxes would have to be laid which would affect the necessities of life. We wished to levy these taxes in such a manner that they would work as little hardship as possible upon the laboring classes, and upon those who now need for their support and comfort nearly all the income which they receive from any source. This was the most difficult task the committee had, for they wished to avoid consumption taxes as far as possible. In so doing we levied a tax on transportation on freight, on express, passenger, and pipe lines. Such a tax is spread all over the whole country and affects everyone. The ultimate consumer must pay the freight (Jones will pay it only to begin with), but we were unable to avoid it. While this makes tax on all of the people, it is no very great tax. It is not a tax that is paid all at one time, but by degrees and in small amounts, so that it will be easier paid. Let me call your attention here to the fact, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr.

LONGWORTH] has stated, that out of this vast sum of $1,800,000,000 which we are undertaking to raise only 5 per cent are taxes of this class, and even that 5 per cent will be shared by the rich as well as those of lesser means. In this class of taxes I include the increase made in the tariff rates. The increase was not a scientific plan, but the committee had no time to readjust all the tariff duties to conform to war conditions, which would have taken at least six months. Singularly enough, as I have stated before, this tariff provision (the only provision in the bill which did not have a scientific basis) seems to have been the one which has met with the least objection.

While the bill in its details is not as I would have written it I shall support it, because it represents the composite judgment of the committee, and when amended, as it will be in some details, it will represent the composite judgment of the House. And let me say to those gentlemen who are complaining so much of the income and corporation tax, of the excess profits tax, and of the 5 per cent tax on luxuries on the ground that in some cases they will work hardship or inequity, that they ought to look beyond this mere financial consideration which is always produced by a great war, and consider the fact that we are planning to conscript the youth and strength of the Nation. We will take young men from their business and occupation. We will not only ruin their business and leave them without any income whatever, but a heavy toll of life and crushing misfortunes in the way of injuries and wounds will be imposed. We are asking and we are hoping that these men will give what their country demands cheerfully and willingly. May we not ask the business men of the country, the capitalists, the men of great fortunes (the class who will as a rule especially profit by war conditions) to respond cheerfully and willingly in the demands which are made upon them? Above all we ask, as we ask those who will carry our flag not to falter in sustaining it, that the business men of the country will not hesitate in supporting those who must bare their bosoms to shot and shell, and offer up their lives if necessary, to sustain the honor and rights of their country. [Applause.]

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON FINANCING WAR.

APRIL 19, 1917.

To the BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES:

There is abundant evidence that business men are not only ready but eager to do their full share in meeting the burdens imposed by the war. The principle that a few should not be permitted to profit greatly by the war at the expense of the many is thoroughly sound and equitable, and in our opinion reflects the universal sentiment of the business men throughout the country. The burden of taxation can be made lighter for all citizens if it is clearly understood that waste and extravagance—undesirable at all times—tend in war time to increase seriously the cost of the war. War borrowing leads to extravagance; war taxation leads to economy.

The checking of waste and extravagance removes a great cause of the rise in prices due to the extraordinary Government demands competing with the usual demands of the citizens. Such waste and extravagance as may be tolerated in normal times becomes almost criminal in times of war.

Through war taxation a direct and immediate check can be placed on extravagance in individual consumption. This sets free labor and capital for the production of military supplies and food for ourselves and for others, and tends to reduce the cost of such supplies to the Government, which in turn reduces the taxation necessary.

Rigid economy is imperatively necessary not only to release labor and capital for war work but also because in this way funds will become available for Government loans, and by inducing saving help to keep down inflation. In the elimination of waste the Government is morally bound to set an example. Unnecessary governmental activities should be discontinued; every man and all the equipment that can be spared from routine work of peace should be transferred to the new work of war; the civil establishment, like the Navy, should strip to fighting trim; appropriations for unnecessary work should be avoided; the Government, like the individual, should bring its ordinary expenditures to the lowest level consistent with efficiency.

The money required for war expenditures is secured in two ways—by borrowing and by taxation. It is a possible but most undesirable policy to finance a war altogether from bond issues. This policy imposes a heavy burden of taxation upon a country during the difficult years of readjustment following the conflict. On purely financial grounds war finance based entirely upon loans is also unsatisfactory, because it contributes to a rapid rise in prices. This rise in prices increases the money cost of a war. Government financing through war loans which are derived from savings do not occasion an advance in prices. It is therefore of the utmost importance that in placing war loans every effort should be made to lodge the bonds with those who will make payment from savings. But it always happens that many subscribers to war loans borrow from banks, pledging other property, and even the war bonds. The banks adopt a liberal, patriotic loan policy, and also subscribe largely on their own account. Both these transactions lead to credit inflation, since the amount of such subscriptions and loans takes the form of credits on the books of the banks in favor of the Government or the borrower.

Purchasing power of the people is reduced by a war loan, but not to the full extent of the increased purchasing power secured by the Government. With this increased purchasing power the warring Government enters the market for goods and labor in competition with its own citizens. The Government demand is so insistent that it is not lessened by advancing prices. On the other hand, the demand of the people is finally reduced in consequence of rising prices. Through taxation, however, a more immediate check is placed upon individual consumption. Labor and capital are set free for the production of military supplies, the advance in prices is in considerable measure escaped, and consequently the money cost of the war is kept down.

Taxation must not, however, be carried so far as seriously to impede business. On the other hand, particularly in the United States at the present time, it is clear that industry, owing to large profits secured during the last two years, is in an uncommonly strong position and able to bear its full share of taxation.

It should be further noted that during a war it is entirely possible for a community to pay larger amounts of taxes than in normal times of peace. Production during war is mainly directed toward the supply of commodities of various kinds for immediate use, largely on Government demand. In times of peace marketing problems are far more complicated, competition among producers is more severe, and much labor and capital are employed in adding to the equipment of the community for use in future years. All of these factors make it far more difficult for the community to endure extraordinary high taxes and at the same time continue the progressive development of the country. It is highly desirable, therefore, that the financial policy of a country at war should be so designed that war taxes will cease with the ending of the war and so permit a prompt return to a normal basis of taxation.

INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAX.

In providing for the large expenditures of the Government now needed it is obviously necessary that the burden should be distributed as widely as possible and fall as fairly as practicable upon all classes of our citizens. To this end a large part of the sum about to be raised should be derived from increase in the individual income tax. At present the exemption for married persons and heads of families is $4,000, and for single persons $3,000. We approve the suggestion of the administration that to meet the present emergency the exemption for married persons and heads of families should be reduced to $2,000, and believe the exemption for single persons should be reduced to $1,200.

At present the supertax does not apply until the income reaches $20,000, and beginning then with 1 per cent it runs to 15 per cent for the largest incomes. We recommend that the war supertax should begin with 1 per cent on incomes in excess of $3,000 and gradually rise to 40 per cent for the largest incomes. The normal tax, which is paid by all income-tax payers, should remain as it now is, at 2 per cent.

Certain serious defects in the present law grow more apparent as the rates increase, and should be corrected. For example, the individual taxpayer can now deduct the interest paid out for money borrowed to carry tax-exempt bonds, whereas the income derived from such bonds is not taxable. On the other hand, an apparent injustice is done the individual taxpayer by not permitting the deduction of losses actually incurred during the year outside the taxpayer's regular business, unless such losses are offset by gains obtained outside the regular business.

While we see the difficulty and danger involved, we believe the law should be so amended as to avoid the gross inequities which will be correspondingly burdensome as the rates are increased.

The present law provides for the depreciation of property, but makes no provision for obsolescence. We believe that obsolescence in some cases is as worthy of deduction as is depreciation, and some plan for the consideration of such losses should be provided.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX.

We believe an excess profits tax should be, in principle, a war measure only. It can be justified only when war exists. All business should pay its share toward war expenses, but this tax should be levied so as to disturb as little as possible the financial machinery and the industrial progress of the country.

When a business institution has paid out certain sums in dividends it is obvious that such sums were not needed in the conduct of the business, and that therefore a heavy war tax on such distributed income would not restrict its future operations. If, however, such a tax is imposed on profits undistributed and ordinarily retained in the business, it is evident it may produce serious trouble to the firm or corporation and its employees.

After careful consideration your committee recommends the plan suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury, which is submitted herewith:

"With the same exemptions as now allowed ($5,000 plus 8 per cent on invested capital) the following increases in rates:

"Ten per cent on profits in excess of 8 per cent and not over 15 per cent of capital invested.

"Fifteen per cent on profits in excess of 15 per cent and not over 25 per cent of capital invested.

"Twenty per cent on profits in excess of 25 per cent and not over 50 per cent of capital invested.

"Twenty-five per cent on profits in excess of 50 per cent."

Some amendments, however, are absolutely necessary to remove inequities that will certainly arise from the present wording of the law. Where high rates are levied it becomes more and more important that careful provision should be made for ascertaining more clearly and fully what is meant by the term "capital invested"—also, how profits are to be determined. As these are the foundations on which the plan is built they must be firmly and clearly established.

While this can be easily done in the case of most manufacturing and distributing organizations, there are some where these facts would have to be ascertained by special investigation and valuation. To that end the following amendment to this particular clause in the present law is recommended:

"Provided, That where the actual cash paid in is uncertain or unknown, or where the value of the capital invested shall have become materially different from the invested capital as carried on the books, the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to appraise the value of the assets of the corporation, including good will and trade-marks where there is evidence of capital expenditure in making them valuable, as of the 1st day of January, 1916 (?), and such appraised value shall serve as the basis of the tax.

"Provided, also, That in the determination of the profits, account shall be taken both of depreciation and of obsolescence."

In order to secure expert and impartial determination of such questions as those mentioned above, the committee recommends that local boards of referees should be appointed, to be composed of qualified accountants, to review appeals from preliminary assessments, reporting their findings with recommendations to the Secretary of the Treasury for his action. In order to lessen the number of appeals on trivial grounds, the cost of all appeals should be paid by the petitioners.

INDIRECT TAXES.

In addition to the above there should be levied taxes on luxuries and amusements, and also heavy taxes upon a few articles in general use, in order that a share of the tax burden may be borne by all elements of our citizenship—the articles and rates to be determined by committees of Congress which have at their disposal data to determine the revenue which may properly be raised from taxes of this nature. (You will find at pp. 16, ff, a list of the items now under discussion by the authorities from which selections will probably be made.)

CUSTOMS DUTIES.

It is not desirable at the present time to raise debate or controversy on questions of purely domestic policy, such as a change in the tariff system; hence, duties upon imports should not be suggested except in so far as they are purely revenue measures and leave the tariff system otherwise unchanged.

Your committee believes that noncontentious duties of this sort, and duties which would interfere as little as possible in our relations with friendly countries, can be devised and, so far as they can be devised, they should be resorted to with a view to diffusing justly the burden of taxation.

STAMP TAXES.

Stamp taxes of various kinds have always been used in emergencies, and are a ready means for bringing in promptly a large and continuous revenue. Accordingly, while the committee has not at hand the necessary data to determine properly the best articles or rates which will furnish this revenue, we recommend that in the present emergency stamp taxes be imposed along the lines of the proposals which are under consideration by committees of Congress.

RETROACTIVE TAXES.

The Treasury is authorized to issue $2,000,000,000 in short-time certificates of indebtedness. Any large additional revenues from any form of taxation are therefore not immediately necessary. Nevertheless, there are before committees of Congress proposals for two retroactive taxes—one upon excess profits, the other upon incomes (individual and corporate), both to be applied not to this year's earnings but to the earnings of 1916. The retroactive tax on excess profits is not only wrong in principle but is also unjust, because it proposes to levy a tax on profits of 1916, which have already been distributed. The retroactive tax on incomes, we believe, is likewise wrong in principle, and if it is imperative for the Government to obtain the amount which would be raised by such a tax, it would be more equitable to impose somewhat higher supertax rates on individual incomes during the present year.

POSTAGE.

As an additional source of revenue we recommend an increase of 50 per cent on first-class domestic postage, but not less than 1 per cent additional on each piece of first-class matter. This tax, it is estimated, will produce additional revenues during the period of the war approximating $100,000,000 a year, will be collected with very little expense because the machinery for collection already exists, and will begin to bring in revenue at once.

CORPORATION TAXES.

The committee believes that because of the large excess profits tax to be imposed and because dividends of corporations will be subject to the war supertax as income in the hands of the stockholders, the income tax on corporations should remain unchanged.

As exemptions have been reduced in the case of individuals we believe that as a means of obtaining additional war revenues the exemption now existing in the application of the capital-stock tax should be reduced from $99,000 to $24,000. Such a reduction will increase revenues by some millions of dollars.

INHERITANCE TAXES.

Inheritances are, in our opinion, not proper subjects for war taxes, as such a tax would place an unjust burden upon the estates of those dying during the progress of the war. The incomes from all estates will, of course, bear their full share of war taxes.

WAR EXPENDITURES THIS YEAR.

It is estimated by the Treasury Department that the war expenditures of the United States Government during the next 12 months will amount to about $3,600,000,000, and it is proposed by the administration to raise $2,000,000,000 of this amount through sale of bonds. This would indicate the necessity of raising by new taxation of various sorts approximately $1,600,000,000. Your committee believes that it is feasible and desirable to raise approximately the balance during the first year by taxation, and submits the following schedule tentatively designed to obtain that result and as indicating the relative amounts which may be derived from different varieties of taxes:

Increased income tax on individuals for the year 1917	$400,000,000
Increase of excess profits tax for the year 1917	200,000,000
Increase of 50 per cent in first-class postage rates	100,000,000
Stamp taxes	250,000,000
Increased customs duties, as far as possible of a purely revenue character	100,000,000
Excise taxes	550,000,000
Total	1,600,000,000

This scheme of taxation seems to be so designed as to obtain some contribution to the cost of the war from every citizen. It includes both direct and indirect taxes, as every well-conceived and equitable system of war taxation should. Very properly it provides for meeting by payment out of hand a considerable part of the year's war expenditures. This is wise. The more we raise by taxation during the progress of the war, the less will be the difficulty of returning to normal taxation after the war.

ISSUES OF BONDS.

With reference to details of bond issues authorized by recent legislation the committee deems it unwise at this time to make any definite recommendations. These matters have been left by Congress to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, and he has indicated his intention to confer widely with those who are expert and experienced in handling such matters. However, we are confident that every effort will be made to sell the bonds to the individual investors rather than to banks and financial institutions, and that payment by subscribers will be permitted in installments extending over as long a period as the needs of the Treasury will allow, and the greatest care taken in the method of distirbuting the proceeds so as not seriously to disturb the banking and financial operations of the country. We commend the proposal that the initial issues should not exceed $2,000,000,000, and that for the purpose of distribution the Government should coordinate all governmental agencies, all the national banks, State banks, and trust companies, and other available distributing agencies.

The committee deems it inopportune to discuss at this time the question of exemption of Federal bonds from the Federal income tax. It believes, however, that this is a question of growing importance and one which should be brought to the Chamber's attention. It has therefore under preparation a statement on this subject and suggests it be brought at some time in the near future before the members of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States for their consideration.

CONCLUSION.

Modern warfare is extremely costly, and in order to meet any appreciable portion of the expenses during its progress heavy taxation must necessarily be imposed. In European countries it is now generally admitted that far heavier taxes should have been imposed at an earlier stage of the war. The recommendations of the committee in this report are the result of a careful study of the experience of our own people in previous emergencies, and particularly of the very recent experience of other countries. The old adage about a wise man applies equally to an entire nation—a wise people profits by its own experience and by that of other peoples.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I will not take much time of the committee. I only wish to say to my colleagues here this afternoon that over in Cincinnati about this time one of the country's most distinguished leaders is buried to-day. The people of my State are paying their tribute to a beloved son of Ohio, who, as an aspiring youth, a gallant soldier, an exemplary college student in two of the country's best colleges, a promising lawyer, a distinguished judge, an able chief executive of a great State, an illustrious Senator, a great orator, a brilliant political leader, a successful business man, an honored citizen, and a beloved friend, was laid to rest in the city of his choice, by the friends whom he loved and who held his friendship as a priceless heritage. I refer to ex-Senator Joseph B. Foraker, a personal friend of mine, whom I learned to love back in 1889 when he came to address the university in which I was then a student, and at which time I was graduated. His address was an epoch in the lives of more than one member of that graduating class. From that time on I became interested in his career, having known something of his accomplishments already achieved. He had been a member of the Superior Court of Cincinnati, serving with the distinguished ex-Gov. Harmon, where he served with great distinction. When he left the bench all the press of the city joined in eulogy upon his ability, fidelity, and courage. At the time of which I speak he was serving his second term as governor of the State, and was then one of the most brilliant leaders in the Nation. Well do I remember his defeat in 1883, when the prohibition question was to the front, and which was the occasion for a brilliant debate between him and Gov. Hoadley. Foraker was then a young man to be a candidate for governor, but even then gave evidence of his heroic character. His defeat in 1883 was but a training for victory in 1885 and again in 1887. His four years at the head of the State proved him a wise executive. He ranked with the best governors in the history of the State. Ohio has ever been a training ground for national leadership. She has furnished her quota for every department—legislative, executive, and judicial. During the period since the war we count our Shermans, our Garfields, our Thurmans, our McKinleys, our Hannas, our Fosters, our Tafts, our Hardings, but no figure during the last 30 years has stood out more prominently than Foraker, the man of "vim, vigor, and victory." His was a familiar figure, and his clarion notes were equally familiar in every State and National convention since that of 1880. I will not attempt to detail his life at this time, but merely to offer some suggestions in a sympathetic study of the leadership of the man who I think has been misunderstood in public life. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, Senator Foraker's life was not cast on the plane of quietude. He sought the highlands where the storm most frequently centered. He never evaded a struggle to avoid the pains of contest. His was a heroic nature. If harmony in council or convention was the order, he would have it, if he had to fight to get it.

His leadership was of that type which appealed to the younger element of the country. Very much like Blaine, he provoked likes and dislikes. His enemies were goaded to the breaking point, and his friends were hooked, as with hooks of steel, to his cause.

His popularity was of the spontaneous character and difficult to fathom. I once heard John Sherman say, after a convention in which Foraker was idolized, "That young man has a following that can not be estimated."

His oratory was sui generis. It was magnetic, not so much in words as personality. He could carry an audience off its feet and lead it at will. Dozens of times was this power at conventions displayed, generally to his hurt, since it opened his motives to adverse criticism.

In 1888 when the Blaine men proposed to nominate him for the Presidency, which was prevented by Foraker himself because of his loyalty to John Sherman, he was cruelly criticized for what he did not do, when it was within his power to have accomplished it.

This impetuous characteristic, which spoke through a magnetic personality in tones which rang with victory, made him loved and hated. It was that nature which attracted and repelled. In a State like Ohio it was destined to produce dissensions at the top.

His contemporaries were Sherman, Garfield, McKinley, and so forth. He was a leader when these men were leaders. It was but natural that his ambitions would run counter to the ambitions of others.

In Ohio, as well as in other States, there were many who wanted to see Foraker reach the highest place in the Nation.

This exaltation from the State would inevitably place any man on the firing line.

Senator Foraker as a constitutional lawyer was regarded second to none in the country. His practice naturally created a constructive rather than destructive criticism. It made him conservative rather than radical in the school of politics. He deplored the tendencies which expressed themselves in modern proposals, such as the initiative and referendum, recall of judges and of judicial decisions.

He was a great advocate of a truly representative government. Among the great many great speeches made before the Ohio constitutional convention in 1912 that made by Mr. Foraker was among the strongest. The amendment adopted to avoid the demand for a recall was suggested by the Senator.

The Senator's ability as a lawyer attracted powerful clients. His connection with these, including the Standard Oil Co., induced powerful and bitter criticism, most of which was unwarranted.

Mr. Chairman, I have but recently gone over the Rogers law and the Standard Oil letters, and I greatly deplore the attitude of the public mind toward both, which is certainly very unjust to Mr. Foraker. They both show how easy it is to circulate reports which are damaging, and how hard it is to correct them, no matter how unwarranted they may be.

The last time I saw the Senator, about three months ago, when I called at his office to pay my respects, his conversation was about his son, whose death was a stroke to his father, almost fatal, and also about public life. He expressed an opinion on the probable decision of the Supreme Court on the Adamson law, which, by the way, was corroborated by later events.

He was a partisan Republican. His loyalty to the party of Lincoln and to the cause of the Union soldier was a passion with him. He was never so powerful as when defending their principles.

Like all great leaders he had his limitations. His was a remarkable career. He has made men by his influence and was himself unmade by the influence of others. His friends were legion and his enemies powerful. But at this hour the country, which he so gallantly defended, and her people, both friend and foe, will think only of his great achievement in State and Nation. He was a true friend, and I here desire to drop a word of tribute in honor of a man who will be more appreciated as the years pass on.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am quite sure that if the country was not engaged in the war there would be hardly a Member of this House who would approve of this bill. It is a bill made necessary, of course, by the war, but its provisions place a very heavy burden upon many of the industries of our country. We are expected to pay into the Treasury a great amount of money in income tax and in excess profits tax, but if the industries of the country are to suffer, as I am led to believe many of them will, there will not be any great amount of money paid in as income tax and excess profits tax. It seems that the gentlemen who framed this bill had principally in mind the people who live in the great cities. They are the ones who will have to pay the greater part of the tax that comes from this bill if it is enacted into law as presented by the Committee on Ways and Means. Industries that are thriving now, some of them not very greatly because of the heavy burdens that have been put upon them in increased cost of production, due to wage increase and for material, have not been making a great amount of money. This bill takes from many of them a great deal of their profits and, in some instances, I believe it will take practically all of their profits. The provision here to tax the automobile business of the country will certainly place that business in the hands of a few of the big manufacturing companies. Inside of six months or so after this bill has become a law it is my judgment that the automobile industry in the country will be in the hands of a dozen or so manufacturers. Others will be driven out. The keen competition that exists at this time in this great field will have disappeared and the public will not be able to use the discrimination they are now permitted in purchasing these necessary vehicles for business as well as for pleasure. The automobile industry is one no longer purely for pleasure and luxury, but these vehicles are used throughout the country, and in the cities especially, for business purposes. This bill is going to prove a great injury to that industry.

It is also going to cripple and destroy many other industries that now are making but small profits. Notwithstanding the tax of 5 per cent of the price for which so sold of automobiles, tires and tubes, musical instruments, motion-picture films, medicines, advertising, and so forth, under Title VI, and which I consider unfair and unjust to the business interests of this country—there are many others. The tax placed upon newspapers and publications as written in this bill is unjust in view of the present high cost of print paper and the great increase in production, and instead of bringing in revenue, will, in my judgment, do the opposite, and injure very greatly, if not destroy in part, the business of these newspapers and publishing houses.

It seems that the Committee on Ways and Means when they could not find a place to secure any of the $1,800,000,000 needed, or whenever they went over other items and added them up, and they were a million or so short, went back and put another tax upon the tobacco industry, upon the beer industry, and the liquor industry. It seems that many Members of this House, especially some gentlemen of the Committee on Ways and Means, have taken an especial pleasure in placing a tax on these industries. They are burdened now, and we know that there are many people in this country, in Congress and out, who want to entirely destroy this great revenue producer. The Anti-Saloon League is now waging a campaign, so that its officials can justify drawing their salaries and holding up the public for money, to have prohibition declared during the war. Their argument for this is to save the grain to feed the people. It is interesting at this point to note an editorial in the Philadelphia Public Ledger. It is as follows:

Various grains with the human food equivalent of 70,000,000 bushels of wheat annually go into American liquor. That would feed about 14,000,000 persons for a year.

But of all the grain consumed in the United States, the barley, rye, and corn converted into ale, beer, and whisky are much the most profitable for Uncle Sam.

Do you realize that last year your Federal Government got in taxes $3.50 out of every one of those 70,000,000 bushels? The liquor industry paid to internal-revenue collectors $247,000,000.

Looked at simply as a revenue producer for our Government, Uncle Sam could afford to buy grain at present prices and give it to the brewers and distillers just to collect the taxes upon their product.

Mr. Chairman, necessarily this heavy tax placed upon beer, whisky, and so forth, is going to result in inferior goods—inferior tobacco, inferior cigars, inferior cigarettes, inferior liquor, and, in some instances, inferior beer, to be sold to the public.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I did not happen to hear the gentleman's opening remarks. Does he believe that we ought to collect at this time the amount of money proposed to be collected in this bill? Does the gentleman believe that we should collect by taxes the money that it is proposed to collect?

Mr. DYER. I believe that we must raise the amount of money provided for in this legislation.

Mr. GARNER. Well, now, may I suggest——

Mr. DYER. I accept the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury. I have not any facts to dispute his recommendation or his judgment.

Mr. GARNER. I think it has been the great preponderance of the testimony of the economic men of this country that we must raise at least $1,800,000,000. Now, I agree with some of the criticism which the gentleman has made and some of the items he criticized I voted against in the committee, but I want the gentleman, in justice to the committee and the House, to give some other means of raising this money when he criticizes the methods which the committee have adopted.

Mr. DYER. Well, I think one thing the gentlemen of the Committee on Ways and Means could have used in raising a great part of this revenue would have been a tax on sugar and candies, which is easily collectible, and would have been a great help in raising this money. I do not believe, gentlemen, that we can afford not to maintain the prosperous industries in this country; we want the industries to go on and prosper, because this war can not be a success unless there are sources to draw from from time to time, and if you cripple and destroy the industries and take away their profits and put them out of business they are no longer resources.

Mr. GARNER. Do I understand the gentleman correctly that he would leave off the tax from cigarettes, tobacco, beer, liquor, and substitute a tax on sugar and candies for them?

Mr. DYER. I would not; I would equalize it more. The gentlemen of the Committee on Ways and Means have increased taxes very largely on those things but did not upon sugars or candies. Those industries are already overtaxed and overburdened.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman speaks of the higher rates paid on tobacco and cigars. Would the gentleman suggest, so as not to burden those articles, that a tax should be placed on leaf tobacco?

Mr. DYER. I should think that would be proper.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, that is one of the untaxed sources of revenue, I will say to the gentleman. There may be some others, but the whole question with the committee, as I understand it, is as to the necessity of raising this $1,800,000,000.

Mr. DYER. That is the only thing, as I understand, that entered into the consideration at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, if the gentleman will permit——

Mr. DYER. According to the address of the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. KITCHEN] and the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], if I gathered it correctly from their remarks, they found it necessary to raise this money, that they had to raise it, and they admit that the bill is imperfect, and, in my judgment, it ought never to pass unless it is absolutely necessary on account of the war.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The cigar being a manufactured article and tobacco having also passed through the manipulation of man, would the gentleman seriously contemplate the placing of a tax upon leaf tobacco in order to relieve the manufactured products?

Mr. DYER I would; yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How would the gentleman feel about a tax on grain?

Mr. DYER. I think that things of that kind ought to be taxed, not ordinarily, but in a time of this kind where there is a war where it is absolutely necessary to have this money.

Mr. KITCHIN. How about meat and flour? They will stand a little.

Mr. DYER. I think the committee could as well put a tax on them than so burdensome and so destructive a tax upon other industries, and especially upon the industries of the cities. They are the ones that are going to pay this tax. It is the cities which are paying the income tax now; it is the cities that are paying the corporation tax now and are paying the excess-profits tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. Would not the cities still pay the tax upon flour and meat?

Mr. DYER. It would equalize it so that all around would pay it for the support of the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. DYER. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Many letters are now coming forward from persons who seem to be in favor of prohibition telling Congressmen not to dare to vote for a tax upon liquor. How does the gentleman regard that question, inasmuch as so much revenue is received from the excise taxes on liquor?

Mr. DYER. Well, my judgment on that would be that the gentlemen who are against that industry that is paying so much for the Government feel that they ought to take all the money that they can before they finally vote to kill it entirely. In other words, use this industry to the brim now when it is needed to save the country in furnishing so much of the revenue. Gentlemen, we are in a war, and, according to the address of the President, it is a war for democracy.

This is a war for civilization, as he said; and if it is, gentlemen, it is a war not only for the benefit of those who live now, but is a war for the future generations. And why not allow the future generations to help pay more of the cost and expense of this war which is for their good instead of putting it so heavily upon the industries and the business interests of the present day that it will cripple them, destroy them, and force them into bankruptcy? We must maintain prosperity in this country, and we must go on and continue to have the business of the country prosper. Men can not pay taxes, can not pay incomes, and can not go on unless business does continue. I, myself, feel that there ought to be important changes in this bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman permit just one interruption? What industry have we taxed in this bill that you think really will be destroyed or crippled so that it will largely curtail its business?

Mr. DYER. Well, I have stated that I thought the automobile industry would greatly suffer. I have stated that I thought the cigar and tobacco industry would suffer and that the public would suffer as well from inferior goods. The moving-picture shows of the country are not now a luxury; they are the cheapest form of amusement that is open to the public, and they are being heavily taxed in this bill. Chemicals and medicines are going to have serious trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DYER. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. DYER. There are many other things that are taxed here on the theory that they are luxuries, when, in fact, they are really necessaries. Proprietary medicines and all those things needed for the sick and poor are placed in here. As to the second-class mail matter, I agree there ought to be some injustices corrected in reference to that. It ought to pay more, but from the way it is written in this bill it is going to suffer unjustly. The zone system of taxation in this bill is wrong. I think it should be so much a pound the country over. I hope and sincerely trust, and I believe, that before this proposed legislation is written into law that it will have most substantial changes. Unless so, then Congress will be forever condemned for not giving proper consideration to the legitimate and hard-working industries of this country. We had better have more bonds than to destroy business.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting a few of the many protests I have received on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. The protests are as follows:

The STATE NATIONAL BANK,
St. Louis, Mo., May 10, 1917.

Hon. L. C. DYER, Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DYER: I thank you for your letter of May 7, and am quite sure that you will feel that you have taken the proper action in deciding that it was your duty to your country to vote as you did on the selective-draft question. I really believe that you will have the approval of all of your constituents, with the possible exception of a few rabid pro-Germans.

I have just wired you with respect to the retroactive feature of the proposed new income-tax bill. I think it would be manifestly wrong to make the bill retroactive. A large number of our citizens responded to the call of the United States internal-revenue collector and paid their income tax for this year, due June 30, ahead of time. In fact, I paid my own and my wife's income tax on the 20th of March, and I think it would be manifestly unfair for Congress to pass any bill that would make us pay last year's taxes over again when they have already been paid in full.

Yours, very truly,

E. B. PRYOR.

Hon. L. C. DYER,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DYER: We have noticed in to-day's paper that the new revenue bill, among other things, proposes a 5 per cent tax on telephone bills, which means a 5 per cent tax on the gross business of the companies.

There are very few telephone companies in this country to-day that are earning more than 5 or 6 per cent on their capital stock, and the great majority of them, especially independent companies, are not paying any dividends at all. This is also true of very many other public-service corporations in the country.

A 5 per cent tax on the gross receipts in most instances will mean either the bankruptcy of the companies or the only remedy left them, an appeal to the State commissions for an increase of rates. The number of such applications before the State commissions by all companies not earning dividends or earning only 2 or 3 per cent will be so great that the commissions will be unable to attend to more than a very small percentage, and as most of the commission laws in the country prohibit an increase of rates without the sanction of the public-service commissions, it will mean bankruptcy to many public-service corporations as well as many others.

The experts tell us that in times like these it is necessary that business be kept healthy and active in order to pay the taxes needed by the Government, and if this is true, may we suggest that a tax of 5 per cent on gross receipts of public-service corporations is liable to cripple the business of the country.

Our own company can stand this tax more than most telephone companies, but even to us it will mean a tremendous burden and amount close to $100,000 a year.

The sentiments of nearly everyone whom I have come in contact with has been in favor of doubling the postage rates on all newspapers and periodicals and advertising matter, because of its twofold effect, raising revenue, stopping unnecessary mail, and reducing the paper stringency.

Very truly, yours,

Hon. L. C. DYER,
Washington, D. C.:

We note by morning papers that Ways and Means Committee have agreed on war-revenue bill. We consider provisions of bill necessary and wise except the retroactive features with respect to income clauses. We feel the retroactive feature will cause endless trouble as it is virtually ex post facto and will upset many completed transactions and contracts. The public is quite willing to be taxed for the money that our country needs, but any action retroactive or ex post facto in our opinion is unwise and inexpedient and probably unconstitutional. No man or firm can ever know what commitments or contracts can be entered into if Congress can pass retroactive laws at will. We hope you may share our views and oppose retroactive laws as fundamentally wrong.

The undersigned takes opportunity to voice its sentiment regarding proposed tax of moving-picture shows. There is no branch of commercial industry so exposed to rigid taxation as amusement industry. Therefore we are compelled to denounce any unjust revenue placed upon us at this time. Other business is subject to a 5 per cent tax, while we are forced to submit to 10 per cent increase, which will result in the closing of many of our theaters, amounting to the taking of property without due process of law. We respectfully urge you to do all in your power toward a more equitable measure.

The St. Louis coffee roasters, representing entire trade, at special meeting do not object to any equitable tax on duty on coffee, but protest against eliminating the stocks in hands of all retailers. Many large chain stores and roasters who sell direct to consumers have enormous stocks on hand and yet might be classed as retailers, thereby evading the tax, and would procure an undue advantage over the many smaller retailers. Wholesale grocers have many orders on hand, taken at specified prices prior to May 10 for delivery at later dates, and anticipate much annoyance and friction with retailers over these. By including all retailers' stocks for taxation both objections would be overcome and all possible charges of class legislation would be avoided. Entire trade would appreciate making tax effective when bill is passed, instead of May 10, as this would vastly simplify matters and cause least business disturbance. Above suggestions will also materially increase revenue.

Hon. L. C. DYER,

DEAR SIR: I am advised that the Ways and Means Committee recommend a revenue bill that will place a tax of 5 per cent on the gross business of manufacturers of proprietary medicines. If this bill were to be passed in addition to the increased tax on alcohol, the stamp taxes, and the various other taxes which are proposed, it would force us to discontinue our business. There is a tax, of course, imposed on railroad tickets and upon freight. All of those taxes combined, as proposed to-day, would render it absolutely impossible for us to conduct our business except at a great loss, and we can not believe that the people interested in making such laws in Washington desire to place a burden on the business interests of the country that will force them out of business. It is not one law that is directed toward the business interests to-day, but they come from every angle, and if this drastic legislation is carried to the extent that is now proposed, it will defeat the very purpose intended.

I trust you will see the justice of our position and use your best influence to defeat this pernicious bill. We want to pay our fair share of the taxes, but we still desire to continue to do business.

DEAR SIR: It is very hard to understand how any lawmakers will deliberately vote a war tax of 10 per cent upon the gross receipts, making it impossible for any legitimate business or theater to keep their doors open and operate, with the fixed expense they are now under. It is a fact that only about one theater out of every ten are now making their expenses under the present conditions. I can not believe that it is the intention of our Government to close up all theaters and moving-picture shows. Please stop and duly consider what it really means to a business to take 10 per cent of its gross receipts. It is utterly impossible and impractical to pay out such a tax out of these receipts, and the company operating the average place would be in debt to the Government and forced into bankruptcy. Kindly please give this matter fair and just consideration, and let us stay open, so as to meet our obligations and leases, for which we are liable. We will gladly pay over to the Government all our profits, if needs be and do so want to do our share, which would enable us to still continue business and pay our operating expenses. This, Mr. DYER, is only pure and simple common sense, nothing more; and please help us.

DEAR MR. DYER: Knowing you to be a just Representative, I am appealing to you to vote against the proposed bill to increase the second-class matter, which is enacted and sanctioned by the Ways and Means Committee.

I am employed by a large publishing house, and should this bill go through it will mean an enormous additional expense, which will more than likely result in many of us losing our positions on which we depend for our daily bread and butter.

It is a most unjust bill, as you realize that the publishers are under very heavy expenses now, due to war prosperity, in which they are not sharing.

Trusting you will be a friend to the publishers and do the just and right thing, I remain,

DEAR MR. DYER: Relative to the proposed bill to increase the postage on second-class matter, I am appealing to you to ask you to vote against such an unjust measure. Being employed in a large publishing business I realize what this would mean if the bill is passed. It will throw many people out of positions. Many firms will be forced out of business, and with the high cost of materials it is hard for many to exist. We in the publishing business do not benefit by the war prosperity and have only suffered loss. Then can you see any fairness in increasing the postage? It is only just to tax a corporation on its profits, and no one would object to that. However, if you stopped to consider how many of us will lose our positions, our means of existence, if the bill is passed, I believe you would vote against it.

Very truly, yours,

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE: As you are aware, the newspapers of the country have been very hard hit in the increased price of print paper and all other materials entering into the composition of a newspaper. If the additional burden of increased postage is added, it will put out of existence a large number of small papers and compel the medium-sized dailies to lose more money than they are now losing.

I believe that the zone system is the proper one and that there ought to be no increase in the postage of 1 cent per pound for the first zone, which should be at least 100 miles.

The newspapers are giving liberally of their space to the Government in advertising, and feel that justice demands that they be given the consideration due them by the Government. You will confer a favor upon the Courier-Post and all other papers of Missouri as well by using your influence for a 1 cent per pound postage in a zone of 100 miles.

HONORABLE DEAR SIR: During these strenuous times our manufacturing interests and business must be kept going and stimulated in every way possible. At the present time the piano business is carrying such a burden that it is hardly possible to show any profit. The cost of nearly all material used in the manufacturing of pianos has already advanced over 50 per cent. A further taxation of 5 per cent on this industry will cause many dealers to curtail their business and throw many out of employment. This should not be done.

A piano is no longer a luxury. Music in the home is more of a necessity now than in times of peace. Patriotic music should be in every home. Nothing inspires patriotism more. This extra tax burden should not be laid on the piano industry, and we appeal to you to place the matter before Congress in such a manner that this 5 per cent tax on musical instruments will be taken off from the war-revenue bill.

Washington, D. C.:

Every loyal farm paper in the country anxious to do its patriotic duty and to aid the Government to the very limit of its ability. Congress may take all of our profit, but we implore you to spare our organization. Any increase whatsoever on second-class postage rate will at one stroke seriously cripple if not entirely wipe out majority of farm papers published. High cost of paper and production already makes burden all we can bear. Our auditor's report verifies this statement. Proof furnished you if you want it.

The proposed tax on advertising, if enacted, will develop in the shape of a prohibitive measure toward our business. Our present profits are less than 7 per cent. Our labor and materials are increasing in cost daily, with no opportunities to increase revenue. We humbly beg your indulgence in eliminating this tax in so far as our medium is concerned, in order that we might continue our business.

Hon. L. C. DYER,
Congressman from Missouri,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I sent you a telegram as follows:

"Revenue measure taxing outdoor advertising 5 per cent will destroy the business and produce no revenue. Letter follows."

The present profit on outdoor advertising for the Thomas Cusack Co., one of the largest companies in the country, is 7 per cent. The contemplated revenue bill, which compels them to pay 5 per cent, with the increased cost of labor and material added to this, will absolutely ruin them. There is no great demand for advertising at the present rates, because the demand for all products are so great that no advertising is necessary. There is no competition necessary on account of the war. This business, therefore, is a peculiar business, which thrives only when there is great competition in sales, and you can readily see, under the present conditions, that the outdoor advertising is not necessary in order to sell all the products being manufactured. Therefore, if the revenue measure is so excessive as to destroy the small margin of profit now being made, instead of receiving revenue from this source the business will be destroyed and the Government will receive no revenue. If this business was a manufacturing business, then it could add to its prices to take care of the increased cost of labor and material and the Government revenue; but it does not produce anything that is in demand. The fact is that the demand is so great that the advertising is not necessary.

I wish you would take these things into consideration and not destroy this business.

I am local attorney for the Thomas Cusack Co., and these facts have been laid before me, and I transmit them to you with the hope that you will feel it your duty to avoid destroying one of the business enterprises of this city which helps to sustain the city, the State, and the Government at the present time.

Very sincerely, yours,

JEPTHA D. HOWE.

The proprietary medicine manufacturers are willing to bear their just share of the increase in taxation, but it is unjust to expect us to bear the same tax that every other trade bears and an additional 5 per cent on gross sales. This is confiscatory. Please go before the Ways and Means Committee and insist upon the 5 per cent tax being eliminated.

We wish to enter our protest against the revenue bill proposing 5 per cent tax on tooth preparations, a necessity. It would appear that this legislation is discriminating against this line of business, and ways and means, in our opinion, to raise the necessary revenue should be created that will tax the consumer and not certain individual lines of business. Please present this argument to the committee.

Hon. L. C. DYER,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DYER: In compliance with your request, following conversation with you to-day, we beg to submit the following:

Section 504 provides for a tax of 5 per cent on the amount paid for all advertising (except newspaper and periodical space), which, it is estimated, will produce $7,500,000.

Section 600 provides for a 5 per cent tax on all sales of a number of specified articles, which, it is estimated, will produce $118,750,000.

The two sections, therefore, will, if the estimates are approximately correct, produce $126,250,000.

Taking the business of the A. H. Lewis Medicine Co., of St. Louis, as an example, that concern, under section 504, would be taxed approximately 10 per cent of its net profits.

The same business would have to pay, under section 600, a tax of 5 per cent on sales, which would be equivalent to approximately 30 per cent of its net profits.

These two sections, therefore, will take away from this firm 40 per cent of its net profits, which of course would be further increased by the excise tax, corporation income tax, excess profits tax, extra tax on account of higher alcohol tax, extra tax on account of increased freight rates, extra tax on account of increased passenger transportation rates (traveling men), and extra 10 per cent on account of increased import tax on all imported drugs, etc.

And no mention is here made of State, municipal, or county taxes.

One objection to the taxes proposed to be levied under the two sections named is that they are discriminatory in that a few industries are singled out arbitrarily to bear them.

A further objection is that they take away such an unreasonable proportion of the net profits that it will unquestionably destroy a number of businesses at present successful; and in the proportion that they do this, they destroy the source of the Government's revenue.

We propose, as a substitute for the two sections named, a tax of 1 per cent on all manufactured products (exclusive of farm products of all kinds).

According to the World Almanac in 1914, these manufactured products amounted to $24,246,333,000. It is altogether probable that the volume of these products manufactured have increased since 1914 so as to enable us to use the round numbers of $25,000,000,000 as the volume of the same for 1916.

One per cent tax on these products will produce $250,000,000, just twice the amount the two sections to which objection is taken will produce.

This tax would be so small as not to be burdensome on any manufacturer; and on account of being comparatively insignificant, it would in most, certainly many, instances—proprietary articles, for illustration—be absorbed by the manufacturer and not be passed to the consumer. The exceptions are meat, flour, and other bulk goods. Taking meat, for an example of these, suppose the price is 20 cents a pound. The 1 per cent tax we propose would amount to only one-fifth of a cent per pound, which would have no perceptible effect on the market.

On proprietary articles and other articles with established and advertised prices, the 1 per cent would certainly be absorbed by the manufacturer, and hence would not affect the retailer or consumer. In addition, as stated, it would not be onerous on the manufacturer.

Our proposition would not disturb trade conditions in any manner, and the taxes could be collected at the minimum of expense..

If it were desired to increase the revenue in the manner we propose, you might include mining products, which in 1914 amounted to $3,500,000,000. And probably there are others which do not occur to us as we write.

We believe if you will carefully study our proposition you will see it has many advantages over the sections to which objection is taken.

If you so decide, we trust you will use your best efforts to get for it proper consideration by the committee or, failing in that, that you may think it worthy of being proffered in the shape of an amendment when the bill comes up in the House.

Very truly,

J. H. HOWE.
H. R. STRONG.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, for the first time in many years a nonpartisan revenue bill is before this House for consideration. This is as it should be. Our country is now in peril; we are engaged in a war the magnitude of which is but little understood by the country at large. To meet this great crisis in our country's history the Ways and Means Committee of this House was called upon by the administration to frame a revenue bill that would raise the stupendous sum of $1,800,000,000, the largest revenue bill ever presented to this body in its history.

This bill does not reflect the views of any party or of any one man, but in its preparation every member of the committee had a voice and his views were freely expressed and received fair and earnest consideration.

The result was that while the committee as a whole did not agree on every item, yet the measure in its entirety reflects the views of a majority of the committee, and its members joined in recommending it to the House without a dissenting vote.

To show the spirit in which this bill was framed and to show that in its preparation the members subordinated their individual views for the general good of the country, let me say that on no one contested item was there anything like a strict party vote.

The entire committee joined hands in an earnest effort to devise ways and means for the raising of revenue, with due regard to the great industrial and commercial interests of this country, and with the view of making the burden as light as possible on those least able to stand it; but this unprecedented demand for money with which to successfully prosecute the war in which we are now engaged imposed upon us the unpleasant duty of subjecting every citizen in this country to some method of taxation, either direct or indirect.

The bill presented taxes almost everything under the sun except our patriotism. That, sir, as Germany will learn, can never be taxed. Our patriotism alone will remain on the free list, and will be kept there by Republicans, Democrats, and Progressives.

Mr. Chairman, this will not prove a popular law. Congress is being flooded with telegrams from one end of the country to the other in which the senders assure us that they are patriotic, and then very patriotically suggest that the taxes be placed on the other fellow.

We have learned from these telegrams that music is now a necessity of life, and that it would be preposterous to think our people can continue to exist without Coca Cola, and that without the fashionable magazine life will not be worth living.

It is quite evident that the poet who wrote these lines lived in another world:

We may live without poetry, music, and art;
We may live without conscience, and live without heart;
We may live without friends; we may live without books;
But civilized man can not live without cooks.

He may live without books—what is knowledge but grieving?
He may live without hope—what is hope but deceiving?
He may live without love—what is passion but pining?
But where is the man that can live without dining?

No; this is not a popular law, but is a law of necessity. If the youth of our land are willing to sacrifice their lives to the end that the honor and integrity of our country may be maintained, it does seem that those who remain at home should deem it a privilege to see that our boys are given the arms and ammunition with which to fight our battles, and are supplied with wholesome food and some of the ordinary comforts of life.

When our people are brought to the realization of the fact that our country is engaged in the greatest war in the history of the world, that it will take millions to wage it successfully, and that sacrifices must be made, not only by those on the field of battle, but by those who remain safely and securely at home, then will contributions in the way of taxes be made cheerfully and without a murmur.

At the last session of Congress, when this country was at peace with the world, and the House had under consideration a revenue bill, which proposed to raise the money necessary to run the Government almost entirely by direct taxation, and the time-honored method of raising revenue by custom duties was conspicuous by its absence, I then took occasion to say:

I believe the method of taxation proposed in this bill to be un-American, undemocratic, and unpatriotic, because all classes and all sections should contribute toward the support of this Government, and should deem it a great and proud privilege to be able to participate in the maintenance of the dignity, honor, and glory of this great Republic.

My views as then expressed have undergone no change. While the present bill contains many of the features of the bill of last year, it is yet much broader in scope, in that all classes and all sections are made to contribute toward meeting the extraordinary emergency with which we are now confronted.

And, again, we are now confronted with very different conditions. We are at war with the best prepared and greatest military power on the face of the earth. Our allies, while not lacking in courage, are lacking in funds, and we have been called upon to meet their financial distress by unprecedented loans, which will soon exhaust the $3,000,000,000 bond issue authorized for this purpose. Without these conditions there are but few items of taxation in this bill that can be defended.

The sole and only excuse for such legislation is the one word, "war." I believe it was Gen. Sherman who said, "War is hell," and judging from the protests we are receiving, it would seem that much the same thing is being said of this bill.

That this is a nonpartisan bill is shown upon its face. It carries methods of taxation that are distasteful alike to Democrats, Republicans, and Progressives. Mr. KITCHIN, the leader of the majority, and Mr. FORDNEY, the minority leader on the committee, both extremists upon the principles of their respective parties, have subordinated principles for the good of their country and have joined hands with the entire membership of the committee in recommending this measure as being the fairest and the wisest that can be adopted at this time. In time of peace some of its provisions would cause both protectionists and free traders to raise their hands in holy horror.

This is a revenue bill, pure and simple. Our country is suddenly plunged into war, and Congress is at once convened into extraordinary session. The President, in a forceful and well-considered address, calls upon Congress to meet the situation by prompt and necessary legislation. The Ways and Means Committee is in turn called on to frame a bill which will raise a sum so stupendous that it has no precedent, either in the history of this or any other Government.

The money is needed at once, and there is no time for hearings that are so necessary to the proper and scientific adjustment of various schedules and items.

In the performance of its duties the committee has laid aside all party prejudice, has substituted patriotism for politics, and submits this bill as being the best, wisest, and least burdensome that could be framed under existing conditions and circumstances.

EXCISE TAXES.

It was the policy of the committee in framing this bill to exempt from taxation as far as possible the absolute necessities of life and to distribute the taxes between accumulated wealth and luxuries.

In the course of general debate this bill has been attacked from many angles, but I have yet to hear any Member suggest a reasonable substitute for the items and provisions which they would strike out.

It is true that there are advocates in both branches of Congress for the adoption of excise or consumption taxes, but the imposition of such taxes upon the necessities of life would be unwise and probably disastrous. Those who advocate the placing of excise or consumption taxes upon cotton, wheat, sugar, rice, corn, and other necessities are clearly taking no thought for the future.

That there is a scarcity of all of these articles is shown by the fact that the prices they command are even now unusually high, and their production should be urged and encouraged by every means that this Government can devise. Certainly it would be no encouragement to the producer of these articles to force him to pay a tax even before he is privileged to place them upon the market.

If the reports from the Department of Agriculture are true, we are threatened with a scarcity of food, and we are informed that there is a prospective danger of a much more serious scarcity, bordering on a famine. This is due to the fact that we have been producing not only for ourselves but for the millions of soldiers fighting in the trenches in France and Belgium; and now that we have joined the allies, all of whom are suffering from food shortage, it becomes our duty to share with them the necessities of life.

The Department of Agriculture, realizing that we are face to face with a food problem that will tax the vast resources of this country, is now making every effort to get our farmers to increase their acreage and produce crops that will meet the demands not only of our own people but those of France, England, and Belgium. Our State authorities are cooperating in this important work, and the cry "Back to the land" is heard from one end of this country to the other. The Government is appealing to our farmers to produce bumper crops, and thousands of our boys have volunteered to till the soil, so that our people may not suffer from the want of food or be compelled to pay exorbitant prices for the absolute necessities of life.

In the face of this situation it is strange indeed that we should hear any talk of consumption taxes upon food and other necessities of life.

There are now pending in certain committees of this House measures which have the support and indorsement of the administration looking to Government control, conservation, and distribution of food products. I do not know the scope or extent of these measures, but it is whispered that it is proposed to fix a maximum and minimum price on food products.

It would be small encouragement indeed to the farmer if, when he produces the necessities of life, he is first deprived of a market regulated by the law of supply and demand, and then made to pay an excise or consumption tax before he can market his product at all.

In framing this bill, therefore, the committee refused to impose any direct taxes upon the necessities of life, and has so distributed the burden of taxation as to protect those least able to stand it. It is to be hoped that the policy adopted by the committee will be adhered to in both branches of Congress.

CONSUMPTION TAX ON SUGAR.

I know but little about the production and marketing of other food products, but I do know something about sugar.

The report of the Department of Agriculture on cane sugar production in the United States shows that in 1916 Louisiana produced 303,900 tons of sugar. The average yield of cane per acre was 18 tons, and the average yield of sugar per ton of cane was 149 pounds.

An excise tax of 1 cent per pound on sugar, as has been proposed and urged in the debate, would mean that the small sugar territory in Louisiana, two-thirds of which is in the district which I have the honor to represent, would pay over $6,000,000, and this in addition to the other taxes imposed by the provisions of this bill.

It would mean a tax of $20 on every ton of sugar produced. It would mean a tax of $1.49 on every ton of cane raised, and that our sugar farmers would have to pay approximately $27 for every acre of cane cultivated and manufactured into sugar.

But, of course, it will be contended that this tax will be passed on to the consumer, and so it would, but it would be passed on, not by the sugar farmer, but by the Seaboard sugar refineries.

Most of the Louisiana output consists of raw or unrefined sugars, and the only buyers are the refineries, who are so considerate of each other as to refrain from trespassing upon the other's territory, so that we have but one buyer for our sugars. The result is, that the Louisiana producer of sugars is to a great extent at the mercy of the refiner, who not only manipulates the market, but who, notwithstanding the fact that the sugar is actually refined in the city of New Orleans, is always compelled to accept 15 points under the New York quotations for Cuban raws.

This margin is supposed to represent the freight rate from New Orleans to New York, but as a matter of fact no such freight is paid, because the American Sugar Refining Co. does its refining in New Orleans and distributes its sugar to the southern markets just as it does to the eastern markets from New York. In other words, the domestic sugar producer in Louisiana is compelled to dispose of his sugar at 15 cents per 100 pounds less than the price paid for Cuban raws in New York.

In the course of my remarks in the Sixty-fourth Congress, during the consideration of the bill to repeal the free-sugar clause in the Underwood bill, I submitted and read certain letters written by the local agent and manager of the American Sugar Refining Co. at New Orleans to the home office in New York, suggesting that the market be depressed with the view of purchasing the Louisiana sugar as cheaply as possible.

This manipulation of the market by this Refinery resulted in a suit being instituted by a number of sugar planters, and the same was compromised a few days ago by the refining company paying some half million dollars by way of damages—a clear admission that the market had been manipulated by the Refining Company.

But if any further proof be needed to show the efforts of the Seaboard Refiners to destroy the domestic industry, this proof has been furnished by Mr. Frank C. Lowry, the representative and general sales agent of the Federal Sugar Refining Co.

This is the same Frank C. Lowry who represented himself for many years as being the secretary of the "Wholesale Grocers' Association," but who, when placed under oath before the Ways and Means Committee, admitted that there was no such Association; that he alone constituted its membership; and that he was the paid agent of the Federal Sugar Refining Co., for whom he had expended some $25,000 in spreading "free sugar" literature all over this country.

This is the same gentleman who, when the House had under consideration the repeal of the free-sugar clause in the Underwood bill at the last session of Congress, was flooding Congress with letters advocating an excise tax upon sugar.

And, now that our country is at war and in need of revenue, he is even more active along the same lines, and has gone so far as to suggest the repeal of the tariff duty and the imposition of a flat excise duty of 2 cents a pound on sugar.

Fortunately for the domestic sugar interest, the purpose and intent of this self-confessed impostor is well understood by a majority of this Congress. His purpose is to destroy the domestic industry and thereby stifle all competition, to the end that the Seaboard Refiners may absolutely control the sugar market. He well knows that the domestic industry can not survive without a tariff, and that an excise tax would be ruinous to the producers of raw sugars in this country.

With the domestic sugar industry destroyed and out of the way, the refiners would no longer have competition, and the market price of sugar would be under their control and domination.

For the first time since the enactment of the Underwood bill, the sugar farmers of this country—due to war prices—have been making some money on sugar, and those who were able to survive the disaster that followed the enactment of that measure, are now paying their debts. To now place an excise tax upon sugar would be to complete the calamity that followed the threat of free sugar.

While the provision in the bill imposing customs duties of 10 per cent ad valorem upon all articles, both upon the free and dutiable lists, was adopted by the committee for the purpose of raising some $200,000,000 by way of revenue, it will yet have a far-reaching and beneficial effect. It will encourage and add stability to those of our industries which, while now prospering by reason of war prices, will be dependent upon protection when peace has been restored.

That which is uppermost in the mind of every patriotic American at this time is—How can we best prepare to meet and overcome our enemy? But in solving this question, which no one doubts will eventually be solved by victory for the American and Allied forces, we must not lose sight of the fact that there is still another struggle ahead of us—the struggle for industrial and commercial supremacy—which is sure to follow when peace has been declared.

To meet this condition and prepare this country for the flood of products grown and manufactured by foreign cheap labor, fair and adequate tariff duties will have to be imposed in the way of protection, and it is well that we should "take time by the forelock" and by the imposition of additional duties at this time accomplish two most important and desirable ends—the raising of the necessary revenue to successfully prosecute the war and preparation for the competition that is sure to follow upon the termination of hostilities.

CONSUMPTION TAX ON COTTON.

I am as much opposed to the imposition of an excise tax upon cotton as I am upon food products.

Cotton is a necessity, as the people of this and other countries with which we are allied must be clothed as well as fed. It is destined to play a very conspicuous part in the present war, for not only does its value consist in furnishing necessary material for clothing but it is equally necessary for many other purposes, not the least of which is the food value of its by-products.

The Manufacturers' Record of May 17, 1917, contains an article which gives some amazing and very interesting information relative to the value of cotton. In speaking of its varied uses it says:

> Cotton furnishes the material which clothes the soldiers of the land. It furnishes the material for every tent on every battle field. It furnishes an ingredient in the making of explosives for which there is no substitute. It furnishes the absorbent cotton and the bandages for the hospitals of the battle fields as well as for the hospitals in private life. It furnishes much of the material for the production of automobiles and automobile tires, the sails for ships, the clothes for the civilian as well as for the soldier. But it is not simply as the clothing of the world, not as the battle-field tent to shelter the soldier, not as the sail for every ship that is still driven by the wind, but as a distinctive food crop that the country needs to adequately understand cotton.

After enumerating and commenting upon the many by-products of cotton seed and its food and feed value, the article states that the seed from a bale of cotton represents in food value 207.5 pounds of hog lard and 16 bushels of corn, or 207.5 pounds of hog lard and about 1,650 pounds of wheat flour.

The total food and feed value of cotton seed is placed at $350,000,000 a year, and attention is called to the fact that the 7,000,000 tons of cotton seed produced by the South contains potential food value the equivalent of 481,000,000 bushels of wheat.

In the face of these facts, it is apparent that the production of cotton should be encouraged, and not discouraged, by imposing an excise or consumption tax.

The fact that under the provisions of this bill, cotton, like the other articles, carries a 10 per cent ad valorem duty, was by many considered as a joke, but to the producers of long-staple cotton, in time of peace, it will prove a godsend, and by giving protection to the producer of the long-staple cotton we are incidentally extending production to those who produce the short staple.

In conclusion permit me to say that it has been no pleasure to the Ways and Means Committee to impose this great burden of taxation on the people of this country, but the money with which to prosecute this war is an imperative necessity.

Let us indulge in the hope that victory will soon perch upon our banner and that no further taxation for war purposes will be necessary.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the fact that the task of raising this amount of revenue is a wonderful task, and I expect that it is beyond the power of human ability to make a law that will approach very closely to an equable distribution of those taxes. But it occurs to me that there are some injustices in this bill that can be remedied. I appreciate that anyone who admits that this money should be raised should not offer an objection unless he can at least make some suggestion as to where, if a tax is taken out, that taxation can be made up in some other way. It occurs to me that a very easy way to have raised a considerable sum of money could have been adopted by the committee—and I trust it will be considered by the committee before final passage of this bill—and that would have been by placing a tax upon business. We have 20,000,000 of business men in the United States, 10,000,000 of whom will pay no tax whatever; that is, of this additional amount of tax. That is to say, it is estimated there are 10,000,000 business men conducting some kind of independent business that will not contribute one cent of this war tax, for the reason that their surplus is not sufficient to be taxed; that their income is not sufficient that it will be taxed, and yet they are making some considerable amount of money. Now, then, I do not believe it would be a hardship upon any man who is an independent business man to contribute some little portion toward this sum, so that if the small sum of $3 had been laid upon each man conducting an independent business, including some manufacturers, blacksmiths, carpenters, farmers, those who are contractors, and all other classes, it would have amounted to $60,000,000. That is an item worth taking into consideration if it becomes necessary to remove some of these other items.

Mr. REED. Would the gentleman include dentists, doctors, lawyers, and other professional men?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. He did not mention them.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; but they are included among the 20,000,000 I have designated. One striking inequality and one that will prove injurious to the very measure itself, is that in which you propose to raise $7,500,000 by levying 5 per cent on the gross incomes of all advertising concerns other than newspapers and periodicals.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me interrupt the gentleman right there.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I really think our figures are very high on that. I doubt whether we will raise over a million or a million and a half on that item.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. You are not entirely wrong, and I will tell you why you are not entirely wrong; that is, admitting that the business will be conducted as it is now conducted. The total amount of advertising in the United States from all sources is estimated at $800,000,000 a year. Now, the bill-posting advertising and the advertising not only by bills posted upon boards but the character of advertising that we see upon these billboards throughout the country along the lines of railroads amounts to $80,000,000, so that the 5 per cent that is levied upon this item alone would amount to $4,000,000. Now, it is estimated that there is some $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 expended in smaller advertising schemes, such as those that we see in the street cars, and so forth, so that your figures may not be entirely amiss. But here is what is going to happen: If you take and levy this 5 per cent tax upon this small proportion of the total advertising these men, in order to live, must take and pass it on down to the original purchaser of this advertising matter, so that the men who are to-day doing $80,000,000 worth of this advertising will be compelled to pay 5 per cent on their business, and what will be the result? The men who are the purchasers of advertising space will not pay it, for the reason that they can get it 5 per cent cheaper by going to the other advertising mediums and schemes where they do not have to pay it because it is not assessed against them; so that out of the $800,000,000 of advertising in this country, you are singling out practically $80,000,000 of it and putting them into a discriminatory class to pay this excess of 5 per cent, and the result will be that these gentlemen will have to go out of business.

Now, a fair proposition would be to take and reduce the amount of this 5 per cent and extend it over the entire class, so that each one of them would contribute his fair proportion, so that each one would have no advantage over the others. It occurs to me that that ought to be done, and it seems to me as if it would be easy enough to do this.

There is another thing that, I think, should be considered: I can not agree with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] when he says that you have levied this extraordinary tax upon automobiles upon the theory that they are luxuries. The time once was when they were luxuries. That time has passed. The time is now when 75 per cent, I dare say, of the automobiles in this country are as absolute necessities as the horse is to-day an absolute necessity. Go down into this town: Here is a business man who is conducting a retail or wholesale business; he does not have horses any more to take and haul his delivery wagons or his drays, but he has an automobile—either a truck or a delivery wagon of some character of an automobile carriage. So that, I say, you are discriminating there. One man, up-to-date, has the automobile carriage for the purpose of conveying the output of his store; the next man to him, not up-to-date as he is, still continues to use the old horse and the old dray. Yet you are discriminating against the man that is thrifty and enterprising and putting a premium on sloth. So that I say there is a discrimination that should not be had. So, too, throughout the country the automobile is fast becoming a necessity.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him right here?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Just to get the gentleman's idea about it: Do you really think that this 5 per cent tax, if put on the purchaser of an automobile, would prevent the purchaser from buying an automobile? Take the case of a $1,000 machine. The tax would be $50. Would a tax of $50 deter a man from buying a $1,000 machine, even if the agent deducted his share and the manufacturer was not willing to stand any of it? Would $50 keep him from buying an automobile?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not think it would. That is not the ground on which I am basing my opposition to this tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. It would not hurt the industry?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I do not think it would materially hurt the industry. The industry has been hurt already, and it may be better for the country if it is true that there are not as many automobiles purchased in the country now as there were several months ago, and I expect the business will generally decline. But that is not the proposition. The proposition concerns the fairness or unfairness of it. I remember here during the last session of Congress there was a glaring inequality in the revenue bill presented at that time which, when it was pointed out, was defeated, when we were levying an extra tax in addition to all other taxes upon banks in this country. It was knocked out upon a motion in this House. That is the same objection that could be made against the taxing of automobiles. If they were purely a luxury, and only the rich were using automobiles, then I would say, "Well and good." But it is a discrimination against a legitimate business for legitimate purposes, and there is no reason why this tax should be placed on the automobile to the exclusion of other manufactured articles any more than there was reason for that illigitimate tax being placed on the banking institutions of this country.

I admit that this money must be raised. I think this is the time and immediate taxation the way to raise it. I do not subscribe to the theory that these extraordinary taxes should be made a burden upon future generations. Future generations will have to meet their problems, and will have to contribute their portion to the times in which they live. This is our war, and we ought to pay for it; but I do believe that in raising the revenue to defray the great expense incident to this war it should be distributed just as nearly as possible among all the people, so that there may not be that feeling of discontent and that feeling by one class that they have been discriminated against in favor of another class.

This extra tax, that must be raised, and that has been placed entirely upon automobiles, could be distributed out among the other manufacturing industries of this country. Why not place some of it upon the tractor manufacturer; why not place some of it upon the thrashing-machine manufacturer; why not place some of it upon the mowing-machine manufacturer and some of it upon the carriage manufacturers of this country? Why, there are thousands and thousands of dollars tied up in fine carriages, which are being drawn by fine horses, that are used for nothing else in the world except for the comfort of the luxurious rich. The time has come in this country when the luxurious rich spurn the automobile. They are investing their money now in and are scouring this country to get the finest horseflesh that they can find, and are building the finest carriages that they can build, and riding in them to the exclusion of the automobile, because the automobile has become so common.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say that we are touching them up a little on the income tax and the excess profits tax—the luxuriously rich.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That may be; but I am saying now that it would be far more equitable if this tax that is being placed upon automobiles could be scattered over various manufactures, and that the result would be a better feeling among the people. It occurs to me that that is one of the greatest assets, especially in time of war.

Now, I hope that the committee will take into consideration the proposition I have made with reference to this business tax. I believe that in all justice to the men who are engaged in the advertising schemes of this country you should adjust that burden so that it will fall equally upon all. As at present arranged, it will ruin the men who are doing this $80,000,000 of business, for they will have to go out of business, because their customers will not pay that 5 per cent. People will get their advertising from these other schemes and these other sources that are not taxed this 5 per cent. Whenever it comes to a business proposition, sentiment to the winds, and men go where they can get things the cheapest, and if they can get the same advertising at 5 per cent less than they will be compelled to pay if they subscribe to these various schemes that are taxed, it is safe to say that the men who do this $80,000,000 worth of business to-day will have to go out of business, and this source of tax supply will be entirely destroyed. So I trust that the committee in its ultimate conclusion will see to it that this unfair item at least is remedied. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

We urge that these measures be used at once for the protection of the thousands of young men from our colleges who are to assemble next week at the training camps.

2. The Association of American Colleges respectfully urge upon the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America the national prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor for the period of the war for the sake both of the highest efficiency of our Army and Navy and for the truest conservation of the resources of the Nation.

PRICE OF PRINT PAPER.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I desire to introduce a bill and to occupy just one minute with a statement concerning it.

This measure, entitled "A bill to declare print paper a public utility and to empower the Federal Trade Commission to fix a reasonable maximum price therefor, and for other purposes," is introduced for the purpose of bringing before Congress the very oppressive conditions regarding the trade in print paper. These conditions threaten to destroy the business of many publishers.

Some doubt may arise as to the power of Congress to declare this commodity a "public utility," and also as to whether the trade commission can be authorized to fix the maximum price for print paper. The subject is a very important one. My investigation leads me to the conclusion that Congress should speedily take some action regarding the matter. The industry is trust controlled, and the most exorbitant charges are now being made, and unless some relief is obtained thousands of publishers will be driven out of business.

The bill (S. 2267) to declare print paper a public utility and to empower the Federal Trade Commission to fix a reasonable maximum price therefor, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paper used for printing newspapers, magazines, periodicals, books, and other publications is hereby declared to be a public utility. The Federal Trade Commission is hereby authorized and empowered, after full hearing, to fix a reasonable price as a maximum to be charged for such paper. All charges made for print paper shall be just and reasonable and every unjust and unreasonable charge for such paper is prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

SEC. 2. That the Federal Trade Commission shall have full authority and power at any time to institute an inquiry upon the complaint of any corporation, partnership, individual, or community or on its own motion in any case as to any matter or thing in relation to or connected with the charges for print paper. And the said commission shall have the same powers and authorities to proceed in any inquiry instituted on its own motion as if it had been appealed to by complaint or petition.

SEC. 3. That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby authorized and empowered to make an order or orders, after full hearing, that the dealer who deals in print paper shall cease and desist from charging for print paper an amount above the maximum found by the commission to be reasonable. Any dealer or manufacturer of print paper, or officer, representative, or agent of such manufacturer or dealer, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, or agent of either of them who knowingly neglects to obey any order made under the provisions of this act shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $5,000 for each offense. Every distinct violation shall be a separate offense, and in case of a continuing violation each day shall be deemed a separate offense. The forfeiture shall be payable into the Treasury of the United States, and shall be recoverable in a civil suit in the name of the United States, brought in the district where the manufacturer or dealer has its or his principal office. It shall be the duty of the various district attorneys, under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, to prosecute for the recovery of forfeitures.

SEC. 4. Every manufacturer and dealer in print paper shall file with the Federal Trade Commission within 60 days after the passage of this act and keep open to public inspection a price list showing all the prices and charges for print paper of different grade and character. No changes shall be made in the prices or charges which have been filed in compliance with this act except after 30 days' notice to the commission, which notice shall plainly state the change proposed to be made in the price schedule then in force, and the time when the changed prices and charges will go into effect; and the proposed changes, prices, and charges shall be shown by printed new schedules, or shall be plainly indicated upon the schedules in force at the time and kept open to public inspection: Provided, That the commission may, in its discretion, and for good cause shown, allow changes upon less than the notice herein specified, or modify the requirements of this section in respect to publishing, posting, and filing of price schedules, either in particular instances or by a general order applicable to special or peculiar circumstances or conditions.

SEC. 5. That all hearings by the Federal Trade Commission under the provisions of this act shall be public.

RAILROAD FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask leave to introduce a bill to amend section 15 of the act to regulate commerce, and I ask that the bill be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The bill (S. 2268) to amend section 15 of the act to regulate commerce, as amended June 18, 1910, was read twice by its title and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 15 of the act to regulate commerce as amended June 18, 1910, be further amended by striking from the second paragraph of said section the following words: "the commission shall have, and it is hereby given, authority, either upon complaint or upon its own initiative without complaint, at once, and if it so orders, without answer or other formal pleading by the interested carrier or carriers, but upon reasonable notice, to enter upon a hearing concerning the propriety of such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice; and pending such hearing and the decision thereon the commission upon filing with such schedule and delivering to the carrier or carriers affected thereby a statement in writing of its reasons for such suspension may suspend the operation of such schedule and defer the use of such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice, but not for a longer period than 120 days beyond the time when such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice would otherwise go into effect; and after full hearing, whether completed before or after the rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice goes into effect, the commission may make such order in reference to such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice as would be proper in a proceeding initiated after the rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice had become effective: Provided, That if any such hearing can not be concluded within the period of suspension, as above stated, the Interstate Commerce Commission may, in its discretion, extend the time of suspension for a further period not exceeding six months"; and by inserting in lieu thereof the following: "the commission upon its own initiative may, and upon complaint or protest shall, at once, and if it so orders, without answer or other formal pleading by the interested carrier or carriers, but upon reasonable notice, enter upon a hearing concerning the reasonableness and propriety of such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice; and pending such hearing and the decision thereon, the operation of such schedule shall be suspended and the use of such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice shall be deferred until after full hearing and shall take effect only after the commission has found and declared the same to be just and reasonable, neither unjustly discriminatory nor unduly preferential or prejudicial nor otherwise in violation with the provision of this act, and after full hearing the commission may make such order in reference to said rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice as would be proper in a proceeding initiated after the rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice had become effective. At any hearing involving a rate increased after January 1, 1910, or of a rate sought to be increased after the passage of this act, the burden of proof to show that the increased rate or proposed increased rate is just and reasonable shall be upon the common carrier, and the commission shall give to the hearing and decision of such questions preference over all other questions pending before it and decide the same as speedily as possible."

SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to say only one word with reference to the bill. While it is somewhat long, it embodies but a single thought, and I mention the explanation of that thought which will render it easy for those who will read the bill to at once comprehend it. It seeks to change the present law so that where an application for an increase of rates is made with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that application is protested, hearings shall be had before the rate goes into effect. That is the substance of the bill. It provides for hearings before the Interstate Commerce Commission before a protested increase of rates may go into effect.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator merely introduces it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is all. I introduce it, and I give that word of explanation as to its meaning. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia subsequently said: Mr. President, this morning I introduced a bill amending the Interstate Commerce Commission law. I desire to ask the consent of the Senate to have printed in the RECORD in connection with the bill three statements—one from the Alexander Hamilton Institute, one from Poor's Manual, and one from the Traffic World—giving some figures bearing upon the proposed legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[1] Per cent of net income remaining after paying fixed charges. A company whose balance after fixed charges is equal to 50 per cent or more of the net income is in sound credit.

Since June 30, 1916, the earnings of the southern lines, both gross and net, have shown great increases. For the two months of the new statistical year which began on January 1, 1917, operating revenue in the southern district rose from $81,709,808 to $90,733,089; expenses from $54,438,477 to $60,804,550; the net income from $27,271,335 to $29,928,939; operating income from $23,688,322 to $25,855,645; and the operating ratio from 66.62 to 67.01. The western district showed increases as favorable as those in the southern district, while in the eastern district the operating income shows a decline from $59,729,193 to $36,132,412, or a decrease of $23,596,781, while the operating ratio rose from 71.21 to 80.93. From this showing it would appear that if an emergency exists because of increased operating expenses it is confined to the eastern district and does not extend to the southern district. A statement showing with respect to the principal systems of railways operated in the South the total operating revenue, net income, per cent of earnings on common stock, surplus, and miles operated for the year ended June 30, 1916, as shown in Poor's Manual for 1917, appears in the margin.

In the western district the revenue rose from $145,036,922 to $168,212,917; expenses from $99,158,057, or from $853 to $895 per mile.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. THOMAS. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 56, after line 3, add a new section to Chapter VII, as follows:

SEC. 5. That all boards of trade, chambers of commerce, stock exchanges, or other bodies or associations engaged or permitting speculations in food products of any character in the form of what are known as futures, or in any other form or character, are hereby suspended until the President, by proclamation, shall declare the existing war to have been ended, and all agreements, wages, and contracts for wages regarding food products of this character now and heretofore made in or upon such exchanges, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, or other bodies or associations by the members thereof are hereby prohibited pending such proclamation. Any person, board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association willfully violating the provisions of this section, or any of them, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not to exceed $10,000.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the need for such legislation as this amendment contemplates was emphasized last Friday or Saturday by the suspension of the making of speculative contracts or futures upon the Chicago Board of Trade, a step taken, if we are to accept press accounts, in the spirit of patriotism, but doubtless prompted by a far more serious consideration; the evident danger involved in the continuation of speculating in the necessities of life at this juncture.

Mr. President, greater than the armed forces of Germany, greater perhaps than the menace of the U-boat warfare, is that of food speculation in the United States at this time. Whether it be speculation upon the boards of trade or chambers of commerce, cornering and controlling of life's necessities, of prohibitive freight rates, or car detention, those now engaged in these nefarious practices are the real foes of the American people.

It is to my mind incredible that Congress, appreciating the importance of husbanding our grain resources and prohibiting their use for the manufacture of beverages and liquors during the war, the importance of preventing a sacrifice of our grain supply in the production of intoxicants, the importance of prohibiting their use by the Army, is not also fully alive to the far greater evil of speculation now confronting us.

The most of this speculation, at least the most of it with which the public are acquainted, is carried on through the boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and stock exchanges, which are notorious for the practice.

To my mind, while the liquor evil in this country is a terrible one it is not so menacing or far-raching in its disastrous consequences as the universal and all-pervading spirit of speculation, the gambling spirit, which has deprived and is depriving our agricultural communities of their best blood and luring it to the exchanges, the spirit which is animated by the desire and opportunity to "get rich quick"; that desire fed by press circulation of instances where enormous fortunes have been made in a day or an hour upon the exchanges, and fed also by the enormous fortunes which have been realized by the opportunities offered by this war.

Mr. President, those who corner the food of the country, utilize the exchanges for manipulation of prices to hoist them high enough to satisfy their greed and bring the desired profit are criminals. If exchanges for manipulating these prices, for futures in grains which do not exist, which never existed, and which never will exist, can be eliminated, one of the methods through which the enhancement in the necessities of life will have been removed.

Does anything at present appeal to the exigencies of legislation more powerfully than that which is designed to remove this evil?

Mr. President, since this amendment was introduced I have been flooded, literally flooded, with letters and telegrams commending my action and urging me to press the amendment to the consideration of the Senate at the earliest possible opportunity.

For illustration, I received this dispatch, dated May 4, from the firm of F. G. Ferrin Co. (Inc.), Rochester, N. Y.:

ROCHESTER, N. Y., May 4, 1917.

Senator THOMAS,
Washington, D. C.:

May wheat having been down to $2.61, or 19 cents lower than last night's close, now up to $2.72, all within 20 minutes. Such business should be stopped at once until conditions are again normal. See letter of yesterday.

F. G. FERRIN CO. (INC.).

Here is a letter from Boston, Mass., and I have time to call attention to only two or three:

That grain exchanges——

This amendment, of course, is not aimed at those exchanges whose legitimate business it is to promote and assist the trade of the country by bringing buyer and seller together—

That grain exchanges are necessary for economic distribution of the crops is unquestioned, but that the successful marketing of the crops depends upon, or is benefited by, the torrent of speculation incessantly pouring into Chicago and other large speculative grain markets from every town of any considerable size, from every city from Bangor, Me., to San Francisco, Cal., and from Grand Forks, N. Dak., to the Gulf of Mexico, is not a reasonable proposition.

It can not reasonably be asserted that the value of grain, as affected by the law of supply and demand, varies from minute to minute throughout every business day, and varies radically. The pendulum of value swings backward and forward several times within a few hours across a range of 10 cents, 15 cents, or even 25 cents per bushel, so that the miller, the distributor, or the exporter can not safely make any offers of their commodity, as they can not tell within the above range, or say the equivalent of from 50 cents to $1.25 per barrel, what the actual cost of production will be 30 minutes after their offer had been telegraphed or cabled.

Then follows a table, which I shall not detain the Senate to read, but which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The table referred to is as follows:

MAY 4, 1917.

	May.		July.
	Highest.	Lowest.	Highest.	Lowest.
April 27	$2.70	$2.53	$2.25	$2.16
April 28	2.79½	2.67	2.36	2.24½

Mr. THOMAS. I have here, Mr. President, the testimony of the food commissioner of the State of New York, given before the Agriculture Committee. It is replete with valuable information upon this subject from end to end. I wish I had time to read it all; but before he closed his testimony, he referred specifically to this subject, and said:

Mr. DILLON. Two years ago I conducted an inquiry in New York growing out of an attempt of bakers there to advance the price of bread from 5 to 6 cents a loaf, and we sent to Chicago and got the testimony from the chairman of the board of trade there, I think he was, or one of the exchanges, and we ordered them to bring any written matter that he had in reference to it, and he brought some correspondence, and this correspondence revealed clearly and definitely the fact that that man in Chicago had been in correspondence with a man in a similar position, on the board of trade in New York to manipulate the prices of wheat at that time between New York and Chicago; and, of course, that is the most definite information that I ever had. But, in a general way we all know that for years the price of wheat has been manipulated in the Chicago market for the benefit of the millers, through those trades. The farmers never get—except the individual farmer—the regular high level of prices.

Senator BRADY. You do not mean the millers alone, but millers and speculators?

Mr. DILLON. I mean the millers as one of the factors of speculating. They are all mixed up in the matter. If a man goes into the pit with a carload of wheat and he is asking a dollar and there is another man that has not a bushel of wheat and offers to sell it—if I am there with a carload and trying to sell it for a dollar and another man comes along and has no wheat and he says "I will sell you two carloads of wheat at 90 cents," he makes the price of wheat 90 cents, and I lose 10 cents a bushel on my carload of wheat.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, there is much merit in the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Colorado, but it ought not to go on this bill. There is a bill, which is to follow this, containing provisions in regard to the subject. There is also a bill now before the Committee on the Judiciary involving the same matter, which was introduced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. I do not think that the pending bill ought to be loaded down with all kinds of measures, and I hope this matter will not be considered in connection with this bill. There are many things in the amendment which I favor. I am against the cornering of food and speculation during time of war, but this bill is not the place for legislation preventing that.

The Senator from Iowa tells me that there is going be reported from the Committee on Agriculture a bill which is known as the food-conservation bill. I ask the Senator from Iowa whether or not there is a similar amendment in that bill embodying the provisions of the pending amendment?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Colorado, as I was out of the Chamber when it was read; but I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that the Committee on Agriculture have reported a bill which they hope to have taken up next, dealing with the general question of food speculation; which is the general question, as I understand, which is involved in the pending amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I understood, Mr. President. We are debating the pending bill under the 10-minute rule, each Senator having only 10 minutes to speak on an amendment. I think the matter embodied in this amendment should be postponed and taken up in connection with the bill which is to follow this, when Senators can have all the time they want to discuss the subject. This amendment involves an important matter, which ought to be fully discussed. I therefore hope the amendment will not be placed on the pending bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. KENYON. I ask that the amendment may be read. As I stated, I was out of the Chamber at the time when the amendment was offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 56, after line 3, it is proposed to insert a new section, which shall be known as section 5, as follows:

SEC. 5. That all boards of trade, chambers of commerce, stock exchanges, or other bodies or associations engaged in or permitting speculations in food products of any character in the form of what are known as futures, or in any other form or character, are hereby suspended until the President, by proclamation, shall declare the existing war to have been ended, and all agreements, wages, and contracts for wages regarding food products of this character now and heretofore made in or upon such exchanges, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, or other bodies or associations by the members thereof are hereby prohibited pending such proclamation. Any person, board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association willfully violating the provisions of this section, or any of them, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not to exceed $10,000.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, just a word. The word "wages," in line 7, should be "wagers." My attention has been called to the fact that there is a misspelling of that word.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I dare say that suggestion applies also to the phrase "contract for wages," in the same line.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; it occurs in two places in that line.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the corrections will be made.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I address myself to the proposal of the Senator from Colorado. I have no doubt that there is much virtue in this amendment, and I have no doubt, sir, that there will come a time when a provision similar to this must be adopted for the benefit of the general welfare of the country.

The eminent Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], having given notice some time ago of provisions such as tendered by him, the information became broadcast, and I have been overwhelmed—well, perhaps that is an exaggerated phrase; I will say I have been quite rained upon by telegrams from the representatives of these exchanges, very largely in my city, asking for some hearing, and claiming that this measure would do a great injury to what they call "pending contracts." They wish, it appears, if it is to be passed, that they be given some time by which they can regulate themselves, and not be the subject of what they insist would be lawsuits for damages and general losses in view of matters upon their hands. Let us have no summary and confiscatory action. I am unable to offer the Senate any information as to how the amendment will operate as confiscation upon such exchanges, but in view of the fact that certain of my constituents feel that this suddenness would occasion great loss and great injury to innocent persons, on their behalf I most respectfully ask that this amendment take some other course than to be precipitously put upon this bill.

Now, Mr. President, may I be permitted a moment to offer a suggestion? In the first place, this condition of the high price of grain is partly being caused by something of a hysteria that seems to possess certain officials of our own Government. Certain gentlemen occupying positions of responsibility in commerce and finance cry out to the country, "Panic!" They are giving the business men to understand that business has suddenly reached a very doleful situation. They urge upon everyone the conviction that hunger is at the door of every human being. They insist that everyone understand that we have reached a point where palsy has set upon the Nation; they warn and invoke the whole country to realize that everything is to be paralyzed in order to execute the war declaration. Sir, this is discouraging business men; it is frightening manufacturers; it is driving every farm enterprise into timidity, if not surrender. It is forcing the accumulation of grain for bread in different bins and in different forms of hiding, that it may be preserved for that future day of desolation and darkness, that certain members of our own administration are, in a most unnecessary and a most untimely manner, holding out to the country.

This country is not in a panic, nor will it be in one. There is need for the ordinary economy in ordinary affairs of life, but there is no need for such parsimony or for such fright and fear as are being imposed upon the country by these well-meaning but misguided advisers who have been put in power in this Government in temporary places.

Sir, this indulged hysteria is one of the reasons for the advance in prices; but if the people understood the truth and realized that these dangers and alarms that have been suddenly hurled and voiced against them have no real foundation or justification, there would not be the hoarding of grain out of fear, timidity, and terror.

Now, sir, what is needed in this hour is that there be a provision of law passed by this body and its correlative body authorizing the President of the United States upon any evidence to him satisfactory that the food necessities are being held for monopoly or for speculation to seize them and order their distribution through the proper channels in such manner, sir, as will compensate the owner with a just market price and at the same time assure distribution to the people that they may need the uses.

Let what is known as print paper, as one of the necessities, be included in this; and once, sir, the order goes forth that the power is in the hands of the President to seize these essentials for the public welfare, under his power as Commander in Chief or as President of the United States, then existing high prices will topple to their legitimate bases, and we would not need pursue this great circumlocutory course as now presented. The proposed course would be so confusing in its operation and so delayed that the citizens would not realize the benefit of it for months and months to come.

I most respectfully ask, therefore, if the able Senator from Colorado would not consent to postpone his amendment until those who seem to have such great interest in it, and who say the adoption of it would mean such great loss to them, may have an opportunity for hearing. For that reason I am compelled to oppose it. I ask more deliberate action lest hasty conclusions defeat the very object intended.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] has said a number of things so much like what I have been intending to say that they differ only in the fact that he has stated them better than I could have done.

So far as the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is concerned, let me say to him, as I said to him in private conversation the other day, that I think means ought to be adopted to stop the speculative inflation of values of foodstuffs, and that whatever can be done within the limits of the powers of Congress to stop speculation and to stop the cornering of foodstuffs ought to be done. But, Mr. President, the wonder to me to-day is that we do not have $4 wheat, 40-cent cotton, five or six dollar potatoes, and beef at 50 or 60 cents a pound. There never has been anything in the history of the world that parallels the present agitation. We are practically told, first, that the United States is upon the verge of starvation, and, second, that the world outside of the United States is already starving. We are in substance informed that next winter the wolf of hunger will be howling at the doors of every home in the world. When that information is put forth, men need not be astonished if the prices of food products mount.

If a plan were to be devised and followed with the express purpose of booming food prices, the methods that have been adopted could not be improved upon by the intelligence of man or the ingenuity of Satan himself. Permit me to illustrate: If a farmer has a thousand bushels of wheat in his bin which he is about to market, and he picks up a report from somebody connected with the Agricultural Department that tells him that wheat is going to go to three or four dollars a bushel, that farmer will certainly hold the grain, waiting for the prophesied advance, as long as he can. If a miller has a large supply of flour on hand, and he is informed by the Agricultural Department that the world is about to starve to death, he will hold that flour for an advance in the market. What I am now saying applies to every article of food whatsoever; but, as my time is very limited, I do not intend further to pursue that thought.

There is, however, another side to the question to which I invite attention. The consumer who reads the startling reports referred to immediately concludes that he does not intend to be one of those who shall starve, and accordingly he rushes into the market and begins buying and buying and buying. I know of ladies in the city of Washington, some of them the wives of officials—I have heard of three or four such instances—who would ordinarily think that their pantry was overstocked with flour if they bought a 25-pound sack, who have astonished their grocer by ordering a barrel or two barrels of flour against the evil day. I have heard of ladies, who ordinarily do not count their pennies, who have gone to the grocery store and bought an entire barrel of sugar. Even these fair housewives seek to prevent the pinch of want. Thus they all contribute to the food shortage they so greatly fear.

So with the holder of foodstuffs, upon the one hand, being encouraged to hold, and with everybody who is a consumer, upon the other hand, being told to "buy, buy, buy, for Heaven's sake buy; you are all liable to starve to death next winter," it is no wonder food prices mount.

Mr. President, I have this to say in closing—and I intend to furnish the facts and figures to back up what I have been saying as soon as debate on this bill is concluded—that whoever rides over the United States of America to-day and gazes at the hillsides, where the corn is peeping forth in its long, straight rows, at wheat fields that are waving in the breezes, at vast meadows of grass that grow rank and green, at fat, sleek cattle that on a thousand hills stand knee-deep in the clover, at hogs and sheep that feed and grow upon a million farms, at the myriad of gardens where every variety of plant and vegetable fit for food is crowding to perfection, whoever surveys such scenes and yet proclaims that the United States is liable to starve is simply an idiot or an enemy of the public welfare. It is time that sort of claptrap was stopped in this country. We are not going to starve to death. Some of these men who are buying $3 wheat now will be broke in a few months; some of these people who are trying to corner food products now will be glad to unload them in a few short weeks.

The thing for the Senate to do, the thing for the Congress to do, is to keep its head; the thing for the great press of this country to do—and I am looking at the press gallery and appealing to it—is to teach the lesson to the American people that America is not going to starve; that, as has been suggested by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who sits beside me, she can not be starved; and there will be a lessening of these conditions that to-day confront us and pest us.

Mr. GORE, Mr. KENYON, and Mr. KIRBY addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I offer a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment offered by Mr. THOMAS it is proposed to insert the following:

That whenever the President finds it essential in order to prevent undue enhancement or fluctuation of prices of, or in order to prevent injurious speculation in, or in order to prevent unjust market manipulation or unfair and misleading market quotations of the prices of necessaries, hereafter in this section called evil practices, he is authorized to prescribe such regulations governing, or may either wholly or partly prohibit, operations, practices, and transactions at, on, in, or subject to the rules of any exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business as he may find essential in order to prevent, correct, or remove such evil practices. Any person who willfully violates any regulation made pursuant to this section or who knowingly engages in any operation, practice, or transaction prohibited by the President pursuant to this section, or who aids or abets any such violation or any such prohibited operation, practice, or transaction, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000 and by imprisonment for not exceeding four years.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that I doubt the wisdom of adopting at this time the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. It is rigid, inflexible, and absolute. It is desirable to avoid doing more harm than good in the enactment of legislation of this kind.

There are a great many people who think that boards of trade serve a legitimate purpose and that they ought to be limited to those legitimate purposes in connection with these transactions. The section which I have offered, I may say, is a section taken from the so-called Lever bill, a bill prepared by the Department of Agriculture, with a slight change, and it contains the ways and means deemed necessary by the department to deal with the situation with which the Senator from Colorado is seeking to deal.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is chairman of the great Agricultural Committee. They are now considering this question. Does not the Senator think it is better not to put that amendment on this bill, but to bring it in from his committee as the report of the committee, and let it be discussed here when Senators can have time to discuss it?

Mr. GORE. I think in the abstract the Senator is perhaps correct, but we are dealing with a situation, and the amendment is pending. If it is the sense of the Senate that legislation of this kind ought to be adopted now and ought to be attached to the pending bill, I desire this substitute to be incorporated in the measure instead of the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. OVERMAN. But if this is voted down by the Senate, will not the committee report out at an early day a measure embodying some of the provisions and merits of the amendment he has introduced?

Mr. GORE. I will say that of course that is a possibility. I could not speak advisedly on that point.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Oklahoma whether the Agricultural Committee has not perfected its report upon a bill undertaking to prevent speculation in foodstuffs?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it does not deal expressly with the boards of trade.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I know that.

Mr. GORE. I may say to the Senator from North Carolina that I introduced as a separate bill the amendment which I have just sent to the desk, with a slight change in the amendment; but it was my thought that if such legislation is to be attached to the pending bill it ought to assume this form rather than the form of the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, one more remark. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if it is not his purpose to press this bill from the Committee on Agriculture with reference to foodstuffs and seek a hearing of that measure as soon as the present bill is disposed of?

Mr. GORE. That is my intention—as soon as the present bill, and possibly some conference reports, are disposed of.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And will not that furnish us an opportunity to study the food side of the question and to put on all amendments of this character that we wish, or to consider them together?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, undoubtedly the pending amendment and the substitute would be more properly attached to the food bill which I reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry last Saturday.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator knows, of course, that the Lever bill, by section 11, also makes provision for the conservation of grain by preventing its use in the manufacture of alcoholic beverages.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS. Yet on Saturday the Senate voted upon that identical proposition and incorporated it in this bill. Now, why not this?

Mr. GORE. I will say that the propositions are not identical. That is, the section in the Lever bill dealing with the liquor question was not identical with the Cummins amendment; and I assume the Senator did not mean to say that.

Mr. THOMAS. No; neither is this identical with the other.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that I believe it would be advisable to have dealt with the Cummins amendment as a separate proposition, allowing it to stand on its own merits—and I think it has abundant merit to win its way through both Houses of Congress—but the Senate ordered otherwise. I apprehend that possibly the Senate may order otherwise respecting the Senator's amendment. If, however, it is to take action now, and in connection with the pending bill, I am anxious to see the substitute adopted instead of the Senator's amendment, because the substitute vests in the President the power to prescribe rules and regulations governing the boards of trade, to prevent speculation and the undue enhancement of prices. I think there ought to be come discretion in respect to the formulation and enforcement of these rules and regulations; otherwise we may accomplish evil instead of good. I have no comment to make on the general policy of vesting universal power in the President, but this is certainly one instance where there ought to be some discretion in an exigency of this kind; and if legislation is to be had, I trust the substitute will be adopted.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to say just a word concerning the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and the substitute of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

If compelled to vote on this proposition, I shall support the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma; but it does seem to me that in the interest of the best solution of this question the amendment ought to be withdrawn. I suggest as reasons therefor that the next bill concerning which an effort will be made to bring it before the Senate is a bill which, while not dealing directly with this question of grain exchanges, does deal with the same general subjects, and deals with this very and vitally important question of stopping the speculation in foodstuffs.

Now, it seems to me that is the proper bill for an amendment of this character. If we are going on with every conceivable amendment, in the shape of any bill that anyone may have in mind, to the espionage bill, which is enough of a Mother Hubbard bill now, we are never going to reach any other bills. Instead of tacking them all onto the espionage bill, I should like to see that bill finished and some other bill taken up. The country is weary of talk. The next bill will be this food bill; or, as I understand at least, an effort will be made to take it up next.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. KENYON. I only have 10 minutes, but I will yield for a question.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to ask the Senator, who is a member of the Agricultural Committee, if the food bill deals with exchanges at all?

Mr. KENYON. It does not; but the committee has considered that question, and the amendment concerning exchanges could be very properly placed upon that food bill. We have tried to divide the food bill, or the Lever bill, into two parts—one dealing with the speculative feature, which is now reported to the Senate, and the other dealing with the question of the stimulation of food production.

I do not want to be put in the position of opposing in any way any legislation that will in some way help to blot out the speculation in foodstuffs that is going on in this country. If Congress can not meet that subject and handle it in some way so as to stop this robbery that is going on—to use a mild term—the people are going to find some remedy, if they have to make use of the lamp-posts of the country; but it would be better to have more consideration given to this amendment, which may accomplish a splendid purpose. I do not know whether it will or not. It may, by shutting all of the grain exchanges of this country, bring about exactly the opposite result.

There is a good deal in what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has said. There is no food shortage in this country now. There is a food shortage in the world, and there may be a food shortage for us to face; and, as far-seeing men, we must realize that situation and try to do something to remedy it. But there has been so much hysteria, so much talk about this whole thing, that farmers have been getting rid of immature cattle and immature hogs, and it is producing a bad situation in this country.

I will go to any extent in any kind of drastic legislation against the food speculator in this country. He is making socialists in this country nearly as fast as we can make soldiers, and it is our duty to find some remedy. I believe that the bill now reported will accomplish great good in that direction. If it is not strong enough, let us work out something here in the Senate that will be strong enough to stop this. The speculator must go. We do not want, however, to injure legitimate business.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] will be adopted. It is said that we have wasted much time in the discussion of things here when we ought to have been acting, and certainly I can cite one instance that will show the necessity for some legislation of this kind. Bread has gone to 10 cents a loaf since this bill has been under discussion in the United States Senate, and it is thought to be due largely to the activity of the gambler in grain, to the efforts of the food speculator. The gambler in grain is a parasite, and always has been, in this country. He is not necessary to its future prosperity, in my opinion.

I am also glad to see that some of our Senators are getting over this war hysteria. I want especially to congratulate the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] upon his complete recovery. It was loudly proclaimed by him that we ought to cultivate all the back yards in the United States because of the desirable result existing in Germany and arising from such intensive cultivation there. He forgot at that time that Germany was a little bit of a country, smaller than the State of Texas by as much territory as the whole State of Alabama. He has now realized the condition of this country and the immense possibilities of it in the way of production of crops and wealth, and I congratulate him and congratulate the Senate and hope soon to be able to congratulate the country upon our returning to sound and right thinking.

I say the right time is now for the adoption of some such legislation as is proposed by the Senator from Colorado, and I do not think it is necessary to unload all the responsibility on the President. The amendment that is proposed here as a substitute by the Senator from Oklahoma leaves it to the President to act when, in his discretion, he shall deem it necessary. Everybody else in the United States deems it necessary now to do something. It seems to be considered imperative that something ought to be done by this matter being brought in here as it is; and I am confident that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado, if it is adopted and made effectual, will have some beneficial result in preventing the condition that now obtains and that threatens to grow worse.

You say that we must have these grain exchanges. It may be so; but it is not necessary to manipulate the price of grain to the injury of the consumer and the producer for the gambler's benefit. There is no exchange to fix the price of lumber, and there never has been an exchange to fix the price of coal, and still we manage to get along with the production and sale of these things. I say it is not necessary in the case of grain, either; it is not necessary that the exchange should permit this gambling in futures that does injuriously affect the price to the people of the United States of America; and I hope that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado will be adopted.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I realize, as every other Senator does, the condition that now confronts us. I also realize the fact that in our desire to remedy conditions we stand in danger of doing more evil than good. There are certain fixed channels to which the people have gotten accustomed. We have tried, in the Agricultural Committee, to draft such measures as will meet the condition, and do the most good with the least possible harm.

I think the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has stated, more clearly than I might hope to do, the exact condition. By calling attention to possibilities that may exist, we have precipitated a condition that would not exist. I do not believe that there is any danger of this country suffering under the proper regulation of our forms of distribution.

Now, I just want to make a plea that we allow the bill that is now pending, reported from the Agricultural Committee after hearings and mature deliberations, to be brought in, coordinated with other things relating to the food supply of this country, and discussed here, rather than bring it in in an undigested form and attach it to this bill in the shape of an amendment. Everyone knows that in the great business of the exchanges of this country a central market place is essential. It is not the market place that we wish to destroy; it is the regulation of the pirates who abuse the market place. We want those men who are engaged in reflecting the price for millions of producers and millions of consumers to do it legitimately; and it is for the regulation of these great modern conveniences that we, as intelligent men, ought to legislate, and not produce embarrassment and confusion and disaster by blocking the very channels which years have built up, and which perhaps have been temporarily taken advantage of by these pirates. Let us go after the men who are speculating in this business, and not destroy the ordinary means of information and distribution.

I voted the other day against the proposition to attach to this bill a prohibition of the use of grain in the manufacture of alcoholic liquors not because I was opposed to it—I am heartily in favor of it—but because the committee had already in its possession a bill looking toward settling that proposition. I did not believe that the bill to which it was proposed to attach the Cummins amendment was the proper place to attach it, and I voted against it for that reason. I am going to have an opportunity to vote for a bill that will prohibit the use of grain in the manufacture of alcoholic liquors along the proper lines, and not bring it in here under a 10-minute rule, undigested, unconsidered, and pass it through the Senate because there is a hysterical cry over the country that we must conserve our food.

All of us know that we must conserve the food. All of us are willing to cooperate in conserving it, but we want to do it as sane, sensible statesmen grappling with a great nation-wide problem, and not inject it unconsidered as has been done. I hope that the espionage bill will be the espionage bill and the food-control bill will be the food-control bill, and that we shall not have an overlapping, interlocking, undigested hodgepodge which nobody knows anything about. For that reason I am going to vote against it, as I think it a most ill-considered grain measure.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I just want to make this observation and then I am through. I am not going to be put in the position of being antagonistic to a righteous thing because I think it is ill advised to take it at a certain place. I am going to exercise my judgment of the fitness of things. I shall vote on this floor for a measure to take grain in a sensible, sane way out of the production of alcoholic liquors and to control this unholy speculation in food in a sane and sensible way, but not, as one Senator said, make this bill a Mother Hubbard so that nobody will understand what is underneath it or what is in the cupboard.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I think it fair to assume that there was some reason for the introduction of the bill that is pending before the Senate. It is fair to assume that the espionage bill had good reason in its inspiration and that at the beginning of the war, if at any time, there was some call for the introduction of such a bill as is before us. I am not sure how long it has been pending before the Senate, but I do know that it has been pending here so long that the country wonders at the dilatory tactics of this body.

I said some days ago that I had grown a bit weary of bringing in amendments to the measure which are not germane and which really have nothing to do with the problems incident to the prevention of spies and other offenses which are a hindrance to the Government in the prosecution of the war. So I am going to venture now, though disclaiming any meaning of discourtesy, to announce that until this bill is disposed of by the Senate, for one I am going to oppose every effort to bring in additional problems. There are big questions arising that this body must settle, and they are important enough to be settled on their own merits.

With that in mind, and measuring the public sentiment to which we ought to make response, Mr. President, I move that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado and the substitute offered by the Senator from Oklahoma be laid on the table.

Mr. THOMAS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am authorized by the Senator from Oklahoma to withdraw the substitute. He withdraws it at the request of the Senator in charge of the bill upon the ground that the subject will come up in another measure a little later and he does not desire to inject it at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question, then, is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. The yeas and nays have been requested on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted, I would vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I desire to know whether the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] has voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (after having voted in the negative). Mr. President, if it is in order I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks a parliamentary inquiry is in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. This motion is plainly a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement. I have already voted, and voted against laying the amendment on the table, because it is a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement, which gives every Senator the right to speak for 10 minutes; but I wish now to change my vote, if the motion is carried to lay on the table. I wish to change my vote from "nay" to "yea" in order to move a reconsideration and say something to the Senate about it. I change my vote from "nay" to "yea."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I vote "nay" because I think it is a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SMOOT (after having voted in the affirmative). Because I believe it is a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement, I want to change my vote from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. THOMPSON. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; and

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to change my vote from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to change my vote from "yea" to "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 54, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—54.

Bankhead	France	Hollis	Knox
Beckham	Frelinghuysen	Husting	La Follette

So the motion to lay Mr. THOMAS's amendment on the table was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate decided to lay the amendment on the table, and upon that I wish to say——

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. For a moment only.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to give notice that when the bill comes into the Senate I shall again offer this amendment with the amendment which was suggested by the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOG], and if it is laid on the table I shall have some other amendment to offer.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I changed my vote and recorded myself in favor of the motion to lay upon the table the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado after I had voted against that motion in order that I might move to reconsider the vote. I was opposed to the motion to lay the amendment on the table because such a motion, since it cuts off debate, is in plain violation of the unanimous-consent agreement. I had intended to say something upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado. I do not think I should have occupied the full 10 minutes to which the unanimous-consent agreement entitles every Senator upon each and every amendment offered to the pending bill. The Senator from Ohio selected this particular amendment, the purpose of which is to stop grain gambling, as one upon which debate should be summarily stopped by a motion to lay on the table.

Mr. President, if we are to have unanimous-consent agreements in the Senate, at least the letter, if not the spirit, of such agreements must be observed. If the Senate can make unanimous-consent agreements limiting debate upon the condition that each Senator will be recognized for 10 minutes, if he desires, and then violate not only the spirit but the letter of the agreement by moving to lay amendments offered upon the table, cutting off debate, then by so doing you can enforce the most drastic form of cloture. But resort to such a practice will render it impossible ever to secure another unanimous-consent agreement upon any bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to state that no one suggested that he wanted to speak further?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did not have the opportunity to suggest it. The Senator from Ohio was recognized, and after making some comment upon the amendment he then moved to lay it upon the table, thus ending the debate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to say that I would not have voted to lay it on the table——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not believe the Senator would.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Had anyone suggested a desire to speak.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not think the Senator would.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] was trying to get recognition when the Chair recognized the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was laid upon the table, and it is so plain that it ought to be reconsidered that I do not care to say another word upon the question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, believing that the motion to lay an amendment on the table is in palpable violation of the unanimous-consent agreement I changed my vote from "yea" to "nay," and I hope that the motion to reconsider will be agreed to without a prolonged debate. The unanimous-consent agreement is clear; there can be no question about what privileges Senators have under that agreement; and the agreement ought to be carried out to the letter.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, merely a parliamentary inquiry. Who is to decide, and how shall it be decided, as to whether or not this is a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement? Should there not be a ruling upon that question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. We will decide that when we vote on this motion.

Mr. OVERMAN. I hope the motion will prevail.

Mr. STERLING. I do not know whether it was left to be decided by the vote on the motion or not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No point of order was raised until the roll call was ordered. There was strictly no right to stop the roll call, even to let the Senator from Wisconsin explain, when he rose to a parliamentary inquiry; but the Chair did it, and there is no action that the Chair can now take, as the Chair sees it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I hope the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin will prevail. If, under the unanimous-consent agreement, any Senator desires to speak I think he ought to have a right to speak.

Mr. LEWIS. I should like to voice my indorsement of that. We on this side were of the opinion that debate had concluded by consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to reconsider. [Putting the question.] The motion is agreed to, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Unanimously.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is before the Senate.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President. I have never been able to understand how the producers of grain in this country could be benefited by permitting the product of their toil to be the sport of a lot of gamblers who produce nothing, but force the prices up and down, as may best advance their dishonest purposes. The Senator from South Carolina speaks of the "pirates" who take advantage of the stock exchange to run down prices and otherwise manipulate the prices of the necessaries of life. The only way to get rid of the "pirate" who takes advantage of the stock exchange to do his dirty work of plundering and profaning the helpless private person is to close the stock exchange which permits the pirates to operate at its board. The great trouble about the whole matter is that the stock exchange is generally under the control of the pirates, and what they do themselves or permit in the exchange is in the interest of the pirates and against the interests of the honest man who labors to produce the grain that feeds the world.

Without imputing improper motives to anyone, it strikes me that the man who wants to get rid of the evil or stop a bad practice would be in favor of legislating to that end right now. This bill is intended to prevent the perpetration of a great number of crimes and misdemeanors. It is for the purpose of restraining men from doing things that would be hurtful to the Nation if done in time of war. I can not conceive of anything more important, in which the people are more vitally interested, than the supply of necessary food and the control of prices as a war measure. The man who would undertake to unduly raise the prices of the necessaries of life or withhold from the soldiers in the field and the women and children at home the food necessary to sustain life is a greater enemy to the country than the traitor who sells his nation's secrets to the enemy, or one who leads his country's army into ambush. As a matter of fact, the scoundrel ought to be sent to the penitentiary or hanged. And now, if it is a crime to deprive the women and children of food or withhold it from the soldier in the field, then I submit that this amendment ought to be adopted and adopted now.

It has a very proper place in this bill. The argument that this bill should be permitted to pass and take this question up for consideration in another bill does not appeal to me at all. The same objection I apprehend will be urged against it even in the Agricultural bill or the bill providing for the control of food supplies. The question of dealing in futures has been discussed upon this floor upon other and divers occasions, and every time it came up the friends and apologists of the exchange were always earnest in their advocacy of postponement lest by hasty legislation we may disorganize the business of the country.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would the Senator be willing to give a definition of speculation in the necessities of life?

Mr. VARDAMAN. The idea I had in mind when I used the word "speculation" was that when men go upon the exchange and buy wheat or other foodstuff not in existence, not intending to have the amount purchased delivered or the seller to deliver the product sold, for the purpose of raising or lowering the price, that is speculation; that is making the product of human toil the plaything of men who do not produce anything. It is gambling, pure and simple, and the interest of the man who produces the thing in which they gamble is in no way considered in the transaction. If the price goes up the producer, if he has been fortunate enough to hold the product of his farm, may be interested, but it is more often the case that the commodity is forced up and the consumer compelled to pay an artificial price for the product of the farm after it has passed from the hands of the man whose toil produced it. It ought not to be permitted. It is a bad practice—a crime against labor—and the only way to prevent it is by a solemn legislative enactment, as is proposed in the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

I wish that I might be permitted to add cotton to the list of articles in which speculation is prohibited, but I am not going to propose that because probably it is not so necessary just now as it is to protect the prices of foodstuff.

Now, the suggestion that there is a "lack of information" on the subject: Why, Mr. President, this subject has been discussed at great length on the floor of this Chamber. Every phase of the scheme has been presented with great ability by friends of the stock exchange, the defenders of gambling, and also by Senators who are opposed to any sort of legislation on this subject. The evils of speculation in the grain and stock exchanges of the United States are matters of common knowledge and I do not see how any good could come from further postponement of legislation unless it be to give the gamblers a little more time to carry on their devastating, plundering work.

Now, if there is any merit in the measure proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], to give the President of the United States the power to close the exchanges or to surround them with certain restrictions, proscriptions, or rules, certainly this Congress, the lawmaking body of the Government, ought to be quite as capable of handling the question, and I submit the Congress is the proper forum for the consideration of all such matters.

I admit that there is some question about the constitutionality of the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, but I am going to resolve the doubt in favor of the amendment, because I realize that the adoption of the amendment will be of far-reaching good and help to the American people who need protection from the commercial pirates and the financial buccaneers who would coin human souls into dollars and wreck the Republic if the pecuniary reward was large enough.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I simply want to say that I voted to lay the amendment of the Senator from Colorado on the table, not thinking at the time that it was in violation of the unanimous-consent agreement; but pending the discussion I have looked over the amendment, and it seems to me that there are some thing about it that are quite objectionable. The amendment is not a prohibition of speculation, but it provides for a suspension of boards of trade, chambers of commerce, stock exchanges, and other bodies or associations engaged in permitting speculation in food products of any character.

Mr. President, there may have been some abuses in boards of trade and chambers of commerce with regard to dealing in food products, but I think also that chambers of commerce and boards of trade are recognized as great instrumentalities of commerce. Why should we now here suspend all operations, legitimate and illegitimate alike, of such boards of trade and chambers of commerce? That is what the amendment will do. It provides:

> That all boards of trade, chambers of commerce, stock exchanges, or other bodies or associations engaged in or permitting speculations in food products of any character in the form of what are known as futures, or in any other form or character, are hereby suspended.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator from South Dakota permit me to interrupt him at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. The junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has suggested an amendment which, when offered, I think I shall accept, which is designed to meet the criticism which the Senator from South Dakota is making, and which is a very sound one.

Mr. STERLING. Very well. I thought the amendment which was proposed by the Senator from Colorado was altogether too broad.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the request has been made that the amendment proposed on the part of the junior Senator from Minnesota be read for information at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be read for information.

Mr. KELLOGG. I now offer the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota. The Chair understands that the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma is withdrawn?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment proposed by Mr. THOMAS it is proposed by Mr. KELLOGG to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the actual sale or purchase of commodities in good faith for future delivery and where the products are to be delivered, instead of settled for as is usual in speculative trade.

Mr. KELLOGG obtained the floor.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield for a moment.

Mr. GRONNA. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota, since he uses the word "actual" in the beginning of the sentence in connection with the words "sale or purchase," that he also use the word "actual" in connection with the words "future delivery."

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no objection to the word "actual" being inserted there, so that it will read "for actual future delivery."

I offer this amendment and desire one moment to explain it. All the grain bought on the Great Lakes during the winter season has to be sold for delivery after navigation opens in the spring—I refer to the actual grain. No company could afford to buy and take the risk of a rise or fall in the market; in other words, speculate in grain. So they must sell it for delivery when navigation opens.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me there, just for a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We found when we were considering this same question with regard to cotton that it would not do to use the words "which are to be delivered," because on the exchanges they pretend always to sell for delivery, and so we used the words "subsequently actually delivered."

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no objection to the Senator perfecting the amendment. I hurriedly drew the amendment to the amendment upon the floor this morning to protect actual purchases of material for future delivery. Manufacturers all over this country are compelled to contract in advance—all the way from 1 to 12 months—for their materials to be delivered in the future, in order to carry on their manufacturing business. I am quite sure that it was not the intention of the Senator from Colorado to prevent contracts for the sale and purchase for future delivery of materials and commodities in the exchanges or outside of the exchanges of this country. Now, I am not opposed, in fact——

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; although I have but 10 minutes.

Mr. KIRBY. Does not the Senator think that if his amendment used the words "for actual delivery in the future" it would relieve any ambiguity and make its meaning certain?

Mr. KELLOGG. I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Colorado shall perfect his amendment. I am not opposed to the principle, and by the vote I cast to table this amendment I do not wish to be understood as being opposed to legislation to prohibit gambling on the exchanges of this country in food products or anything else; and I shall vote at the proper time for any well-considered measure that will limit the exchanges to legitimate dealings in commercial transactions.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield for a question?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will yield if the Senator will be brief. My time is very limited.

Mr. REED. The question will be brief, but I think it is important. Has the Federal Government any authority whatever over these exchanges or their dealings except in so far as it may regulate interstate commerce?

Mr. KELLOGG. I expect not; I understand not.

Mr. REED. If that be true, is not this whole amendment, this whole proposition, in the teeth of the Constitution?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I have not time to enter upon a legal discussion. I presume that the Federal Government has power over contracts of sale in interstate commerce; and as many of the exchanges deal in futures for actual delivery in interstate commerce, I presume also that the Federal Government might have power to regulate those sales. However, I do not wish to discuss that question as my time is not sufficient. But I do wish to say that I am not opposed to the prohibition of speculation in cereals and foodstuffs in this country, nor am I opposed to the prohibition of the use of cereals in the manufacture of intoxicating liquor, but I do believe that these amendments should not be placed upon the espionage bill. They are entirely foreign to the subject we are now legislating about. Discussion on this measure should end, and the bill should be passed so that we may take up other important legislation. We still have pending the Army organization bill, which has been before Congress for nearly a month but which is still in conference. We have the appropriation bill, shipping bill, food-control bill, and revenue bill, all of which are of the most surpassing importance to the people of this country in this war. Are we going to spend three weeks more in legal argument, on technicalities, in trying to place all kinds of amendments on the espionage bill, in taking up the entire summer while time is running and the public and necessities of the Nation are demanding the adoption of these important measures which are essential to our very existence?

I shall vote when the time arrives to limit exchanges to legitimate business and to prohibit, if necessary, the use of cereals in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors, but I do firmly believe that we should pass this bill now and end discussion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia obtained the floor.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I desire to ask the Senator from Minnesota if he thinks his amendment as drawn would permit actual hedging against contracts for the future delivery of actual goods or stock?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that that was the intention. I do believe, however, that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, which I do not oppose in principle, ought to receive careful consideration and be redrafted so that anyone actually purchasing any product and desiring to sell it for future delivery may protect himself against loss.

In answer to the question of the Senator from Oklahoma I will say that all grain is bought practically in the winter for spring delivery. No company could afford to fill an elevator and take the risk of the rise and fall of the market. It must of necessity sell that grain. It is called hedging, but it is the sale of actual grain for delivery in the spring, or in some future month, so that the company buying the grain and handling it in commerce does not take the risk.

I hope this amendment will cover what the Senator from Oklahoma suggests; but if it does not, it ought to be drafted with some care. One can not draw an amendment of that importance in five minutes, while sitting in the Senate, in connection with a bill of such importance as the one now pending before the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I doubt whether the language of the Senator's amendment would permit the actual hedging, and, in my judgment, if you prevent actual contracts for future delivery and actual hedgings against these transactions, you will shipwreck the entire business and do a great deal more harm than good; in fact, it would be a public calamity.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it is well known that the Committee on Agriculture has been working upon a food bill and has reported it. It is the hope of the members of that committee that, immediately after the disposition of this measure, we will take up the food-control bill, at which time the broadest opportunity will be given to Senators to contribute their best thought to making it a really serviceable measure.

I have no fixed view on these proposed amendments. I do not know whether I am for them or against them, and I do not wish to vote on them now. I wish to vote on them when they are offered as part of the food-control bill, which, as I have said, I think will come up immediately after the espionage bill has been passed. I will vote against this amendment now in order that I may consider it then.

But the Senator from Colorado says that we voted for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa on Saturday. Perhaps we made a mistake. Perhaps we ought to have left that for fuller consideration in connection with the general food bill; but I was so sure how I stood on it that I was not embarrassed about voting. As a matter of wise policy it probably would have been better to have let that amendment also wait and come up in connection with the full discussion of food control, which I hope will immediately follow the bill now before the Senate.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. This amendment, as I understand it, does not treat the subject of food control. It simply prevents the speculator from stealing, from robbing——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not yield to the Senator, in the little time I have, except for a question. I do not know whether he is right about that. I do not understand it well enough to know whether it prevents robbing, or whether it may be so drawn as to interfere with legitimate business. I want a broader opportunity to consider it, when the entire subject of food control is the subject before the Senate; when the problem before the Senate will be, How shall we undertake to regulate food control, to put a stop to gambling and to that improper conduct which is unjustly affecting the price between the time the food passes from the producer and the time it reaches the consumer?

I hope we will take up that bill next. I hope we will consider the subject of this amendment fully then; and I vote against it now that I may have the opportunity of considering it then, along with kindred matters.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, an amendment having been offered by the Senator from Minnesota, I am given an opportunity to reply to some objections offered to the immediate consideration of this very important topic.

The suggestion made by a number of Senators—the Senator from Georgia among the number—remind me of a very familiar incident in Holy Writ, wherein Felix told Paul to go his way until a more convenient season. This is not the time, it seems, to regulate or attempt to regulate a matter of prime importance, and I am satisfied from what has been said that, if it is so difficult of understanding, the Agricultural Committee in all probability will be engaged a very considerable time in discussing its various phases. Meanwhile, Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the bill is before the Senate, and ready to be taken up.

Mr. THOMAS. I understood the Senator to say—or certainly some one of the Senators made the statement—that the bill was before the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. VARDAMAN. This provision is not in it.

Mr. THOMAS. But, Mr. President, while we are discussing that measure, the prices of foods are continually rising, and the process is being accelerated by the speculators and gamblers upon these boards of trade.

Two things are said to be essential to a genuine riot: One is hunger and the other an idea. We may have plenty, but some people in this country are starving, or threatened with starvation, in the midst of plenty; and the idea, rapidly growing, with a firm foundation to support it, is that the interference by individuals and societies and boards of trade and exchanges with the distribution of the food and massing it together to control it and create local scarcities in different communities and places is a cause of these enormous prevailing prices for the ordinary necessities of life. What I want is to prevent the hunger, which does exist in some places, and the idea, which is constantly growing, from fusing into open revolt; and I fear it is coming. There is no proposition that we can deal with as a war measure of more pressing importance to-day than the question of food supply and its distribution.

I believe, Mr. President, that now is the time to act. It is more important than any other one item for our immediate consideration. The constitutionality of this amendment is assailed. Mr. President, if the Government of the United States had the power, through the exercise of Federal authority, to suppress the lotteries of the country, then it certainly has the authority to prevent gambling in the necessities of life—the greatest crime now being committed on a large scale in this country.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. While I should like to go on, I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I was just going to ask the Senator if the Government did not reach the lottery by shutting it out of the mails and by stopping interstate transactions, and not by undertaking to go down and suppress the lottery itself?

Mr. THOMAS. It did adopt that method; but we are not confined to that method only. Now, it is true that overbuying has considerable to do with existing prices; but the very fact that there is overbuying indicates that speculation can utilize that fact to increase prices.

Of course there is plenty of food in the country. I do not question that. The very fact that there is plenty of food in the country, and that the people know it, only aggravates the situation. There being plenty, why can not the people get it? Why can not the man who is working for $100 a month, with a large family to support, secure the absolute necessities of life within his means and his income as heretofore? He can not do it, and the margin between what he receives and what he has to pay is constantly widening. That man wants relief. He must have it. Now, we may train armies to meet our foes from without, but matters of internal concern may become of far more tremendous importance, especially if the evils now extant are the result of our omissions of duty in crises like these.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] suggests that we may be interfering with something to which the people have been accustomed. It is true that speculation and gambling on the public exchanges in the necesities of life have been going on so long that we have become indurated to them. The same is the case with the use of intoxicants all over the United States. That is deplorable. You can not, however, accustom the people to starvation. You can not accustom them to living beyond their income, with absolute bankruptcy and ruin inevitably confronting them.

I do not want to interfere with legitimate business, but I do want, Mr. President, if it is possible, in this espionage bill, as a war measure, to see the Government extend its arm and close its hand upon the gamblers in the necessities of life who profit by and gloat over the sufferings and requirements of the people, who coin the hunger of women and children into dirty dollars, while we face the greatest peril of the Nation's life.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am very sure there will be very general acquiescence by the Senate in the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], but I desire for a few moments to invite his attention and the attention of the Senate to the amendment that is under consideration before us to meet the evil of which he speaks.

This amendment is not aimed at the act of speculating at all. That is not its purpose. It declares as follows:

> That all boards of trade, chambers of commerce, stock exchanges, or other bodies or associations engaged in or permitting speculations in food products of any character * * * are hereby suspended until the President * * * shall—

And so forth.

Now, Mr. President, what does that touch: "All boards of trade * * * engaged in or permitting speculations in food products * * * are hereby suspended"? Now, what does "speculation" mean? I have before me here the work entitled "Words and Phrases." According to that—

> "Speculate" means to "take the risk of loss in view of possible gain." (Arentsen v. Moreland, 122 Wis., 167.)

Why, Mr. President, that is what boards of trade exist for, to enable persons to buy, in the expectation of making a gain on their purchase, with a chance of losing. So this means—and we might as well understand the measure that we are voting on—that every board of trade is by this act suspended.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WALSH. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator think that boards of trade the members of which are engaged in buying and selling millions upon millions of bushels of grain which has no existence, which never had any existence, and which never will have any existence, for the purpose of manipulating the price upon the smaller amount which has existence, should be permitted to continue their operations at the present time if the Government can prevent it?

Mr. WALSH. I do not, and I am endeavoring to direct the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Senator's amendment does not attempt to reach such an evil as that; that to reach that he outlaws every public market in the country that is engaged in affording buyers and sellers an opportunity to come together. Now, you can not stand for that.

Mr. KIRBY and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana has the floor. Does he yield, and to whom?

Mr. WALSH. Wait a minute. I want to answer the Senator from Colorado by calling his attention and the attention of the Senate to the fact that another committee of this body, the Judiciary Committee, has been endeavoring to deal with that evil. The Judiciary Committee has been confronted with the necessity of trying to make provision to prevent and punish exactly the thing that the Senator from Colorado now talks about. A subcommittee of that committee consisting of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], the Senator from

Utah [Mr. KING], and myself, reported this morning the following bill:

That any person carrying on or employed in commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, or with or in the Territories or other possessions of the United States, in any article suitable for human food, fuel, or other necessaries of life, who, either in his individual capacity or as an officer, agent, or employee of a corporation or member of a partnership carrying on or employed in such trade, shall store, acquire, or hold, or who shall destroy or make away with any article for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public or affecting the market price thereof in such commerce, whether temporarily or otherwise, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than six months nor more than four years.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. That bill expresses quite clearly my desire, quite in accord with the desire of the Senator from Colorado, to do away with the evil which he so eloquently and so very properly denounces.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. WALSH. But, Mr. President, the question is whether, in order to do away with that evil, you are going to abolish the very market in which the farmer of this country finds an opportunity to dispose of his produce.

I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. Is it not true that if this bill means what the Senator says it does, it is limited by the amendment accepted to such transactions as are speculative and gambling in character and not intended for delivery at all?

Mr. WALSH. Not in the slightest degree.

Mr. KIRBY. I want to ask the Senator another question.

Mr. WALSH. Let me answer——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. KIRBY. Does not the bill that the Senator proposes there only affect the man who actually puts his money into the stuff and corners it, whereas here we are trying to abolish the kind of speculation where a man does not have to buy anything at all, but just puts up margins and gambles on it? The Senator is willing to regulate the man who actually puts all his money into a commodity and stores it up—and he ought to be regulated, perhaps——

Mr. WALSH. I decline——

Mr. KIRBY. But this other measure is designed to reach the man who does not actually buy anything at all. That is the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana has the floor and yielded it for a question?

Mr. KIRBY. That is the question.

Mr. WALSH. I yielded to the Senator for a question. He abused my courtesy in the matter.

Mr. KIRBY. I beg the Senator's pardon. I only wished to submit the question.

Mr. WALSH. I did not want to yield to the Senator to make an argument. Now I reply to his question.

Mr. KIRBY. And I beg that the Senator may have the 10 minutes that I would have had to discuss this question.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, that does not affect the situation at all. This abolishes all boards of trade that permit speculation, and speculation, as I have indicated, is the buying of property, taking some risk, with the hope of making some gain. That is the legal definition of the word "speculation."

Mr. President, I want to remark also that even so, it is utterly impossible to tell what this amendment means. It says:

That all boards of trade, chambers of commerce, stock exchanges, or other bodies or associations engaged in or permitting speculations in food products of any character in the form of what are known as futures, or in any form or character, are hereby suspended.

"Speculation in any form or character." Now, does that mean that the boards of trade which now exist may correct their practices in the future; and, if so, they shall be permitted to continue their existence? Or does it mean that any board of trade that now permits this, however resolute may be its purpose in the future to change its methods of operation, shall be suspended? Bear in mind, the act will speak as of the date when it is passed; that is, at the time this act is passed any board which, by its regular procedure, permits these things to be done is thereby suspended.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I want to remind the Senator that an amendment has been offered to this amendment by the Senator from Minnesota, with which I think he is not familiar. I wish to say also that if the Senator's argument is sound the Chicago exchange should resume its gambling practices which it voluntarily suspended last Friday.

Mr. WALSH. The Chicago Board of Trade, as I understood, prevented speculation in May wheat; it suspended any futures whatsoever in May wheat; and, as pointed out by the Senator from Minnesota, it has prohibited even the most legitimate transactions in May wheat—that is, as I understand, any futures whatever in the sale of wheat.

Mr. President, that is all that I care to say about this matter. I wish to have it understood that you are not voting to punish anybody who shall speculate at all. You are not voting to punish in any manner the boards that now permit speculation or that may permit it in the future; but you are voting here to disturb and to destroy the very heart of these great business enterprises in the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Montana has expired.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I intend to vote against this amendment, not because I am not in entire sympathy with the purpose but I think that perhaps this is not the time to consider so grave and important and so complicated a question. The Congress of the United States and the legislatures of the various States of the Union have for many years been endeavoring to deal with this question of checking speculation or speculative gambling. We are now dealing with a bill primarily having reference to interference with our foreign relations. Of course, perhaps the inclusion of the words "foreign commerce" in the title might in some sense suggest that this amendment is germane, but only in about the same sense that I noticed once in Yonkers, in your State, Mr. President (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair), a signboard by a little hut at the edge of the village "Bull pups and violets for sale here." It never struck me that they were exactly germane, but the vendor in that case thought that they, perhaps, were.

However, this amendment has a specific purpose, and that purpose is to punish the people who engage in the nefarious practice of undertaking to make money out of the necessities of the people and to corner the prime necessities of life. The amendment undertakes to close institutions of great utility, institutions without which the farmer, the lumberman, the wool man, or the cotton raiser could not get the best price for his product. It is necessary for boards of trade and chambers of commerce to exist for the benefit of the producer. It is their legitimate business to bring the purchaser and the seller together and to establish an opportunity to get the best price. I think it is now generally recognized that no moral turpitude is involved in the conduct of a board of trade or a chamber of commerce.

This provision is, I think, predicated largely upon a mistake. It says that the boards of trade and chambers of commerce that are engaged in speculative enterprises shall be abolished. Boards of trade and chambers of commerce are not engaged in enterprises of any kind except to give the facilities of their floors to the actual trader, but the entity itself does not engage in transactions. But it adds another clause:

Engaged in or permitting speculations.

The Senator from Colorado accepts, I understand, in principle, the amendment of the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] that this shall not prevent the actual sale or purchase of commodities in good faith for actual future delivery, which it should not, because there is no great enterprise that does not purchase its material, raw or finished as the case may be, long in advance, long in the future, and before they are created. We purchase labor now in advance by making agreements with the unions running along a certain period in advance before the prices are made upon commodities.

But even though the construction is placed that the amendment of the junior Senator from Minnesota to the amendment puts upon it, I want to ask this question: How would a chamber of commerce or a board of trade know that a transaction, valid upon its face, between A and B, which was completed upon the floor of the chamber, was designed to contemplate an actual delivery or not? There is absolutely no distinction in the form of the contract. If I buy from you, Mr. President, a thousand bushels of wheat to be delivered next autumn, no one would know but you or I whether I intend to make you a delivery or whether our intention is to settle upon the margin.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. KNOX. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Pennsylvania stated that the exchanges were operating for the benefit of the producer, and I have no doubt but what the Senator believes that to be the case. Does the Senator mean by that statement that the producers have a right to enter these exchanges and actually sell or offer for sale their products?

Mr. KNOX. Only through the brokers. These organizations are created for the purpose of bringing the buyer and seller together. I do not wish the Senator from North Dakota to understand that I believe they are not abused. I think though that we ought to sit down in connection with some bill to which the matter is more germane and trace the thing out artistically and scientifically, so that we may reach the evil.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator permit me another question? The Senator has stated that the producer would only be permitted to make the exchange or the sale through a broker. Could he do that through any broker in the United States?

Mr. KNOX. No; he must be a broker who is a member of the board of trade.

Mr. GRONNA. Of that particular exchange? Of course I suppose the Senator knows that the producers of the Northwest have actually been discriminated against and refused——

Mr. KNOX. I shall have to insist upon having the remainder of my time. I am not willing to yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I say this for the purpose of giving the Senator the information that there is more than one exchange, for instance, we will say in a certain city——

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I accept the motive of the Senator, and I am much obliged for the information that he is imparting, but that only gives emphasis——

Mr. GRONNA. I shall, in my own time, give the information.

Mr. KNOX. It only gives emphasis to the fact that there are questions connected with this amendment that should be thrashed out, and that we ought to take it up as a whole and not work on it in piecemeal on this particular bill, without an opportunity to give it thorough and intelligent consideration.

I am just as much in sympathy with any legislation that will lay its hands upon those who speculate in the commodities of life to the detriment of the public as any man on the floor of the Senate, but when I reach forth to lay hands upon that nefarious practice I want to do it in an effective way and in a way that the first court to which the legislation may be submitted will not drive a horse and cart through it.

Mr. President, the whole purpose of my observation was to suggest that this matter should go over until the time when we can consider it more deliberately and as deliberately as its importance demands.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, while I favor the purpose of this amendment and believe that every Senator here favors it, I am going to decline now and from now on to vote for any amendment or any bill simply because the purpose of the amendment or the bill meets my approval when I am unable to construe the effect of the language used in the amendment or the bill. I am unable to construe the language of this amendment. I do not know whether it would accomplish the purpose of the Senator from Colorado or not.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator is in favor of the purpose of the amendment, and I do not doubt it, I would be very glad to accept any change in the phraseology that, in his judgment, would carry out his purpose.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator has shown that very clearly heretofore when he accepted the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota. This discloses the fact that he drew this amendment hastily and without giving it sufficient consideration. He admitted that the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota was an exception and a very important exception to his prohibition of the dealing in futures.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not draw the amendment hastily; but at the same time, if I have not covered the purpose properly I am more than willing to again offer to accept such changes as will, in his judgment, carry out the purpose the Senator has in mind.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have such a high opinion of the Senator's ability as a lawyer and statesman that I imagine if he had not drawn it hastily without proper consideration he himself would have put in the amendment that the Senator from Minnesota offered. I am satisfied also that the language used in this amendment would not have been the language used by the Senator if he had drawn it carefully. I do not think he would have used the words:

> Speculations in food products of any character in the form of what are known as futures or in any other form or character.

There is no one here who does not desire to prevent gambling in food products as distinguished from speculation in food products. The Senator has not drawn that distinction in this amendment.

The Senator has gone further and stated that—> all agreements, wages, and contracts for wagers regarding food products of this character now and heretofore made shall be prohibited.

I am satisfied that the Senator from Colorado does not mean to say that a contract heretofore entered into is prohibited under this bill, and yet that is the language used in it. He states that if a contract heretofore executed as prohibited in this bill is in existence in one of these stock exchanges, then such exchange is suspended. I am sure he does not mean that, and yet it is in the amendment of the Senator.

I simply bring that up for the purpose of illustrating that this amendment is illy considered, that it has not been considered at all. There has not been a Senator on the floor discussing it who has given any clear construction of the language in it; they have all argued the question as to whether or not we should prohibit gambling in food products. We all agree on that proposition.

Mr. KIRBY. I would like to ask a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. KIRBY. Is it not a well-settled rule of construction that no court ever gives any language in a statute a retrospective or retroactive effect unless compelled to do so by the express intent of the act?

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the Senator from Colorado is also too good a lawyer to put that in this bill unless inadvertently. It simply illustrates what I am saying—that there is no Senator here who does not understand what is the purpose of the amendment. He understands the intention of the Senator from Colorado, but he does not understand what this language means. There is no definition of the offense given in the amendment; and I am not willing to stand here and vote for ill-considered amendments or bills simply because the intention of the author is good and meets my approval. I want to know from now on whether the language expresses the desire of the Senator who offers it. I want some appropriate committee to give careful attention to this most important subject, because I hope a bill will pass that will destroy gambling in food products and will not at the same time destroy the legitimate functions of legitimate exchanges and boards of commerce.

Mr. THOMAS. In order to meet the criticism of the Senator from Nevada, I shall ask leave to strike out the word "heretofore," on line 8, and make it "hereafter," as I should like to get the Senator to vote for the amendment. I understand by unanimous consent the permission of the Senate is granted to make that change?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can modify his own amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have already stated my sympathy for this kind of legislation and with what is in the mind of the Senator who offered the amendment. I do not want to be always harping about the Constitution, but it does seem to me lately that the Constitution is about as much thought of here as a statute of Henry VIII. This is the first time it has ever been proposed to my knowledge to undertake to go into the various States of the Union and affect a matter that is purely local. We undertook to destroy the Louisiana lottery, but how did we undertake to do it? We did not enact a statute saying "it is hereby declared unlawful to conduct such a lottery in the United States"—nothing of that sort. We did not reach the Louisiana lottery in that way. The lawmakers of that day did have some regard for the Constitution. I am not saying that we have altogether forgotten it—but they planted themselves on a constitutional power. Accordingly, if you will examine the lottery statutes, you will find this to be the enactment:

> Whoever shall bring or cause to be brought into the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, from any foreign country, for the purpose of disposing of the same, any paper certificate or instrument purporting to be or to represent a ticket, chance, share, or interest in or dependent upon the event of a lottery, gift enterprise, or similar scheme, offering prizes dependent in whole or in part upon lot or chance, or any advertisement of, or list of the prizes drawn or awarded by means of any such lottery, gift enterprise, or similar scheme; or shall therein knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited with any express company or other common carrier for carriage, or shall carry from one State, Territory, or District of the United States—

In other words, the crime is made to consist of bringing the tickets into the United States or in sending them from one State to the other. Thus under that clause of the Constitution we reached the crime which gives us power over interstate commerce. But no one dreamed of such a thing as the enactment of a statute simply providing that no lottery should be conducted anywhere in the United States, because that would be a matter for State control.

That same language, Mr. President, runs through all the sections and all the amendments to the lottery act. In one section they are prohibited the use of the United States mail.

So when we sought to reach the evil of dynamite in this country we did not provide that whoever should blow up a building should be guilty of a crime against the United States. However horrible and heinous that offense may be, the lawyers of that day in the Senate and out of the Senate knew that it was a matter for State control. But what we did do was to provide that whoever shall in interstate commerce transport dynamite for certain purposes shall be held guilty of a crime.

Mr. KIRBY. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED. I think I might as well, because——

Mr. KIRBY. Is it not a fact that Congress possesses power to pass a law regulating interstate commerce, and if the courts should attribute to this the exercise of that power it would be held to be constitutional?

Mr. REED. The Senator said something of that kind a moment ago, but I prefer before answering to finish the sentence which I was on. When we sought, therefore, to reach the dynamite evil we prohibited the shipment of dynamite in interstate commerce, and every man who was convicted in the dynamite cases was convicted on that ground and on that charge. He was not convicted of having blown up a building in San Francisco; he was not tried for that offense; but he was tried for sending in interstate commerce dynamite contrary to the provisions of the statute.

Now, answering the Senator's question, of course it is conceivable that if a statute be so drawn that it is and can be legitimately attributed to the exercise by Congress of a power in interstate commerce it might be so construed, and would be so construed probably. But it does not follow that if we pass a statute and say nothing about interstate commerce, leaving it out altogether, the court will then proceed to construe into the statute language that we did not put there either directly or by inference. Courts can not rewrite the statutes we enact. They may construe, but they can not pass laws.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. It is not proposed here to reach the transactions that are in interstate grain trade. That is not the proposition. The proposition is to reach the concerns which are engaged in transactions of a speculative nature in grain, and that would apply whether they were engaged in purely local transactions or in interstate transactions.

So I say, while I sympathize to the utmost with every effort to stop grain speculations, I am opposed to trying at this time in this haphazard way to enact the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. OVERMAN. I rise, as the Senator is about finishing his speech, to a question of order, and I do so because the Senator is about through.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] had risen to ask me a question.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know; but I am going to raise a question of order. I want the Senator to understand why I do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina will state his question of order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Under the unanimous-consent agreement a Senator can speak but once on an amendment. That does not permit him to speak once on an amendment and once on an amendment to an amendment. In other words, the speeches are limited to amendments. If the Chair will read the unanimous-consent agreement, he will see that a Senator can speak only once upon an amendment; that he can not speak twice—that is, on an amendment and on an amendment to an amendment. I raise that point as the Senator from Missouri is about through.

Mr. REED. It is entirely agreeable to me to have it raised. It is entirely plain to me that it is not a good point.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want the Chair to rule on it. I ask the Chair to read the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say that if the Senator from Missouri had concluded and there was no one against whom the point could be raised, the Chair has no occasion for a ruling.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Missouri has the floor, but is about through. That is the reason why I raised the point. In a few minutes he would have concluded, and I raise the point of order that he is now out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri controvert the point of order?

Mr. REED. Undoubtedly I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Chair to read the unanimous-consent agreement and to rule on it.

Mr. REED. We might be able to get a vote.

Mr. OVERMAN. We will never get a vote if the point of order is not well taken, because a Senator can offer an amendment to an amendment and speak on that for 10 minutes, and then he can submit another amendment to the amendment and speak on that for 10 minutes, and go on for 10 hours. The unanimous-consent agreement reads that—

> No Senator shall speak more than once, or more than 10 minutes, upon the bill, the substitute, or any amendments thereto.

An amendment to the bill is not an amendment to an amendment. I call the attention of the Chair to this language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would like to ask the able Senator from North Carolina what his viewpoint is on the following: Suppose an amendment was tendered and then an amendment to the amendment which presented the identical subject matter. Does the able Senator from North Carolina assume that the Senator presenting the latter could not address the Senate upon it?

Mr. OVERMAN. A Senator can speak only once on an amendment according to the language of the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the able Senator from North Carolina is correct in his construction of the order, this occupant of the chair would be compelled to hold, as presently advised, that the order does not comprehend at all an amendment to an amendment and it rests for its power under the general rules of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. The agreement is that no Senator shall speak more than once on an amendment.

Mr. REED. And the logic of the Senator is this——

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I wish to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has addressed the Chair. The Chair will gladly hear the Senator from Arkansas at the first auspicious moment.

Mr. REED. I have only a suggestion to make. The Senator's point is that as the language of the unanimous-consent agreement is that a Senator shall speak only once on the bill and only once on an amendment, therefore he is precluded from speaking on an amendment to an amendment. If our unanimous-consent agreement does not deal with an amendment to an amendment, then it was not intended to include an amendment to an amendment within the limitation of 10 minutes, and then we have no unanimous-consent agreement with reference to an amendment to an amendment, and we can speak on it as long as we want. It seems to me that that is the logic of the point of order raised by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; a Senator can speak but once on an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will now gladly hear the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to suggest one matter relative to the point of order. I understand if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota to the amendment was accepted, and the amendment having been reconsidered, its status was the same as though it had never been voted on at all. Senators who have spoken on it before are out of order necessarily under the terms of the agreement.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to say a word. I do not think that that position can be sustained. The Senator from Colorado proposed an amendment. Some one talked on it for 10 minutes. The Senator from Minnesota proposed an amendment to the amendment. It would be intolerable that one would have to vote on the principle embodied in the amendment to the amendment without having an opportunity to express his views upon it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I thought the Chair had ruled against the point of order. Therefore I do not want to continue the debate on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did rule against the Senator, but he is anxious to hear Senators who may have a contrary view to present.

Mr. OVERMAN. I hope that we can get a vote upon the bill. It has been before the Senate for over two weeks. It has been discussed here day in and day out, and I should like to get a vote.

Mr. KIRBY. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana a question of order. If an amendment is proposed and an amendment to that amendment is proposed and accepted, does it not become a part of the amendment, and a Senator having once spoken upon the amendment can he be permitted to speak a second time on it under the 10-minute rule now in force?

Mr. WALSH. I do not believe that the Senator from Colorado, by accepting the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota, can possibly preclude me from discussing the principle of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota to the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. If a Senator wants to talk for six hours on any one amendment, he can do so according to the unanimous-consent agreement if the ruling of the Chair is right; but I am not going to appeal from his decision. A Senator can move to strike out any word in an amendment at any time and speak to this amendment to the amendment, and keep on submitting an amendment to the amendment, and so he could speak for 10 hours under that construction of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, if anyone would attempt thus to violate the spirit of the agreement we could deal with that question when it came up.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the point I am making. I want to know whether we can stop debate. If we can not stop it, it may go on indefinitely. I do not make any appeal. The Chair has already ruled on the question, and I will not discuss it.

Mr. REED. I suggest if the Senator in charge of the bill would ask unanimous consent to vote upon the bill at a given hour he might get it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think so. I have tried it.

Mr. BORAH. If the point of order has been disposed of, I wish to address the Chair.

Mr. WALSH. I rose to address the Chair.

Mr. BORAH. Excuse me; I thought the Senator from Montana was through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana still maintains the floor.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I address myself to the amendment before the Senate, and I want to seize the opportunity to reply specifically to the question addressed me when I was on the floor before by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY]. Possibly at the time I replied with more acerbity than the provocation justified, but I want to call attention to it by the reason of the amendment just accepted by the Senator from Colorado. I trust the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] will permit the Senator from Colorado to give me his attention. I trust that order may be restored until I call attention to the matter.

Mr. THOMAS. I beg the Senator's pardon; I was not aware that the Senator was addressing his remarks to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair quite understands that the Senator from Colorado did not hear the first observation of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to invite the attention of the Senator from Colorado again to the fact that the amendment in its outset abolishes all boards of trade. Then, after all such boards of trade are abolished, it provides——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I hope the Senator will wait a moment until I have made the statement. It provides that such contracts as the Senator desires to prohibit are forbidden. Of course, that means outside of the boards of trade, for the boards of trade are abolished.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the amendment does no such thing, if I understand the English language. It suspends such boards of trade as permit gambling in foods during the war.

Mr. WALSH. No; Mr. President, that is not the language of the amendment. That is the point I am trying to make. What the Senator wants to do is what he now says he wants to do; that is to say, his amendment should provide, in substance, that hereafter any board of trade which shall be found to permit these practices shall be thereafter suspended during the war; but, Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that that is not what the amendment provides. I want to speak now with reference to the amendment which the Senator from Colorado has just accepted, the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] to show the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] that that is not the case. It abolishes all boards of trade and then provides:

And—

Now, this is a new thing; the boards of trade are all suspended—

all agreements, wagers, and contracts for wagers regarding food products of this character now and hereafter—

As the Senator now makes it—made in or upon such exchanges, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, or other bodies or associations by the members thereof are hereby prohibited pending such proclamation.

That is to say, after all these boards of trade are abolished, if they go out on the street and make such contracts those contracts are prohibited by this provision. Then, Mr. President, in exactly the same way comes in the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota:

Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the actual sale or purchase of commodities in good faith for actual future delivery, and where the products are to be delivered, instead of settled for as usual in the speculative trade.

That is to say, Mr. President, this will authorize the making of contracts of that character, and there will be no longer any board of trade upon which contracts of that character can be made. If they are made at all, they must be made in private transactions, somewhere else than in the open market such as is provided by a board of trade. That is what this amendment provides for.

The Senator says that he wants to abolish the boards of trade which hereafter permit the transactions denounced by him. If so, let me ask the Senator from Colorado what provision has he made for determining which board of trade does, and which does not, permit these inhibited transactions, and who is going to say whether it does or does not?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, there are boards of trade which make a business of speculation, some of them, I might say, whose sole object is to speculate in food products, while hundreds of exchanges do nothing of the sort.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly. The Senator contemplates——

Mr. THOMAS. But if this measure becomes a law, I think the administration will find no difficulty ascertaining the proper parties to be included within its terms.

Mr. WALSH. That is what I want to know from the Senator—who is going to do that? When the Senator says that he wants to prohibit such boards of trade as will in the future permit this practice, evidently he contemplates that some of the boards of trade will permit the inhibited transactions and that some of the boards of trade will not permit the inhibited transactions. Now, I want to ask the Senator—who is going to pick out the boards of trade that are going to be suspended; who shall make the declaration?

Mr. THOMAS. In turn, let me ask the Senator from Montana what branch of this Government executes the law? He is too good a lawyer not to know that it is the administrative department.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Colorado is too good a lawyer not to know that you have got to put the power somewhere. There are no executive officers of the Government mentioned in the amendment. Is the Secretary of Agriculture going to determine whether one particular board of trade does not permit these transactions? Is it to be the Secretary of the Interior? Is it to be the President of the United States? Who is it that is going to determine whether a particular board of trade falls under the condemnation of the act? When and how is the judgment of suspension to be rendered? Is it to be by an adjudication of a court, or is it to be by a proclamation of some executive officer?

Mr. THOMAS. In answer to that question——

Mr. WALSH. Let me ask the Senator, further, is it to be after a hearing in which the board of trade will have an opportunity to answer the charge that it permits this practice, or is it to be done by an ex parte proceeding?

Mr. THOMAS. I can answer but one question at a time, and the Senator from Montana has asked me several. I will try to answer his first question.

This proposes an additional section to one of the chapters of this espionage bill. It will fall naturally and properly to the department which has the execution of that chapter. I might further reply by asking the Senator from Montana who is to execute the other provisions of this, the most remarkable bill ever brought to the consideration of this or any other Congress? The administrative department. If the Senator is apprehensive that, should the amendment be incorporated into the law, it may not be executed for lack of precision as to what particular department shall administer it, if he will move an amendment covering that proposition I will accept it. I want to meet his apprehensions and those of every other man who advances them as reasons for opposing it. What I want is a favorable vote on this amendment, and I am satisfied, as I think we all are, that it will be enforced, because public opinion will compel its observance.

Mr. WALSH. That means that the Senator can not answer the question; that is all.

Mr. THOMAS. It may be that is the Senator's opinion.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KIRBY. The board of trade itself determines the question. If it sells contracts for gambling purposes, then the law says, "Your exchange shall be closed," and those charged with the execution of the law will close the exchange. The procedure is similar to that in the case of a man who sells liquor to a minor.

Mr. WALSH. Let me ask the Senator from Arkansas a question?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the Senator from Arkansas recognize that there may be a board of trade which would make a rule, and absolutely enforce it, prohibiting these inhibited transactions?

Mr. KIRBY. They would not do that.

Mr. WALSH. Very well. Then, may I ask the Senator from Arkansas a further question?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Who is going to say whether a particular board of trade does or does not commit this offense?

Mr. KIRBY. The court.

Mr. WALSH. What court?

Mr. KIRBY. If a man violates this law he will be prosecuted for it, just as in the case of a man who unlawfully sells liquor to a minor.

Mr. WALSH. Excuse me, but this provision says the board is "hereby suspended." What board?

Mr. KIRBY. The board that permits gambling.

Mr. WALSH. Who will determine that?

Mr. KIRBY. That will be determined upon an inquiry, as in the case of all other crimes, as to whether or not they are committed.

Mr. WALSH. That is to say, the Senator from Arkansas contemplates a judicial procedure of forfeiture, or something of that kind, against the board that is charged with having permitted these transactions?

Mr. KIRBY. Not at all. That is the enforcement of it.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly; that is the enforcement of it. That is the way these decisions are going to be enforced. I submit that there is nothing in the amendment that will give any court jurisdiction to proceed against any institution by which it is claimed a violation of this law has been committed. and that is not what is in the minds of Senators who are voting for this provision. It is not the language of the amendment at all, for the language is that the board is "hereby suspended."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is compelled to inform the Senator from Montana that his time has expired.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the Senator from Montana yielded the floor?

Mr. WALSH. I have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is recognized.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senator from Colorado for a moment. I find myself in regard to this amendment about in the same attitude of mind that I do in regard to some other amendments, believing in the principle and object to be attained and yet somewhat dubious as to the method by which we shall arrive at the object desired.

This amendment on the face of it says:

That all boards of trade, chambers of commerce, stock exchanges, or other bodies or associations engaged in or permitting speculations in food products of any character in the form of what are known as futures, or in any other form or character, are hereby suspended—

And so forth.

Aside from the arguments which have been presented here by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and others, which are not entirely conclusive to me, as to its unworkability, yet upon its face it seems to deal, and under the decision of the Supreme Court in the first employers' liability law would be held to deal, in my judgment, with bodies which were purely intrastate as well as those which are engaged in interstate commerce.

I can not conclude that we have power, even in times of emergency, to disregard the provisions of our Constitution and our form of government which recognizes intrastate and interstate business. So I have prepared rather hurriedly an amendment to be offered as an amendment to the amendment. I do not know whether it meets the situation or not, but I think if it were adopted and should go to conference proper language might be worked out to cover it. The amendment is, to insert after the word "associations," in line 2, the words "transacting business in a way as to be subject to the regulative power of Congress," so that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado will read:

That all boards of trade, chambers of commerce, such exchanges or other bodies or associations transacting business in a way as to be subject to the regulative power of Congress, engaged in or permitting speculations in food products—

And so forth.

The object, of course, of the proposed amendment to the amendment is to bring whatever we are attempting to deal with under the regulative power of Congress to deal with, namely, the interstate-commerce power. Does the Senator think, in other words, that upon the face of this amendment it would be held to be constitutional by the Supreme Court?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, perhaps I can answer by asking the Senator a question in turn. Does the Senator believe that the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], which was adopted on Saturday, is constitutional?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, of course, I can appreciate the force of the Senator's position. As the exercise of a war power and for the conservation of our food supply, I am willing to accept the affirmative of a very questionable proposition and sustain the right of Congress to enact such legislation at this time. It is upon the same theory that I contend that this amendment, if adopted, will be sustained. It is vital to the welfare of this country that our supplies be conserved and increased; it is vital also to preserve the public peace, welfare, and the domestic tranquillity of the United States at all times, and particularly when engaged in war with a foreign power. Upon that assumption this amendment was prepared. I believe that as one of the war powers of the Government at this time, if it be necessary that gambling in food products should be prohibited during the course of this war as an essential to the preservation of domestic tranquillity, preventing domestic revolt and riot, to do away with food speculators, it is or should be within the power of Congress to enact such legislation.

Now, with reference to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho, I should be willing to accept it were it not that I believe it might destroy the practical force of my amendment, because I can not recall any board of trade or stock exchange in the country that is subject to any but the laws of the State which created it. Such bodies are not corporations organized in one State doing business in another; but they are strictly local concerns; and while some of their operations are within the power of congressional regulation, of which this is perhaps one, to insert such an amendment in the amendment I propose might strip it of all vitality.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. I do not desire, of course, to injure the Senator's amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand that.

Mr. BORAH. It is his amendment, and I shall have to content myself with voting against it.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator believes—and I should like to hear him upon that proposition—if the Senator believes that with the amendment he proposes to my amendment mine could still be made effective to reach out and destroy the evil at which it is aimed, I might make no objection to it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am very clearly of the opinion that without the amendment I suggest the amendment of the Senator from Colorado would be void upon its face, and I say that notwithstanding my profound respect for the Senator's ability as a lawyer. Under the decision of the Supreme Court in the first employers' liability case it would clearly be unconstitutional, unless we proceed upon the theory, which I do not accept at all, that because we are at war, that the exigency has arisen which is supposed to suspend all other provisions of the Constitution. I hold the Constitution to be operative and binding in war as well as in peace. I know the war powers under the Constitution are broad and very great and I have no desire to limit or curtail them, but they are all to be exercised under the provisions of and as defined in the Constitution, and as such they are efficient and sufficient.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator permit the present occupant of the chair to interrupt him to ask his opinion what would be the effect of the second ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States in the same case upon the observations in the first case to which the Senator now alludes?

Mr. BORAH. That is to say, whether the second opinion modifies the first opinion. I do not think so. It may be that in the ultimate practical workings of the law that that will be true; in other words, it may be that in its ultimate practical workings we will come finally to seize hold of purely intrastate transactions and draw them to the Government by reason of the fact that they are so thoroughly intermingled with the interstate business that they can not be separated. But that would not be true here, Mr. President, upon the face of it. The pending amendment does not discriminate at all between institutions which may be doing a business purely and wholly within the States of Colorado or Mississippi or Idaho and those institutions which are doing business which reaches out into the channels of interstate trade.

I am of the opinion that nine out of ten of the institutions that are worth while taking hold of in this country would clearly come within this amendment if my amendment were adopted. They are engaged in business which is interstate. They could not continue in business and survive a single fortnight, if they were not permitted to use the channels of interstate trade. It is through the instrumentalities or channels of interstate trade that they effectuate their great purpose, and without the use of them they could not live; they could not survive; they could not do business; they would be financially a failure, and, therefore, in my opinion, with my amendment added, the amendment of the Senator from Colorado would be effective as a practical proposition, and I am clearly of the opinion that it would then be held constitutional.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have such a high regard for the Senator's capacity as a lawyer—he is one of the most earnest students of these questions in public life—that I am willing to accept his amendment upon that statement.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator accepts the amendment, which he has a right to do in perfecting his amendment.

Now, I desire to add just a word in conclusion. Mr. President, I said a few moments ago that in my opinion the amendment offered last Saturday by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] was unconstitutional. I believe it to be so. I did not vote upon the amendment; I was not here; but I spent yesterday in trying to inform myself as to its constitutionality, and I came to the conclusion that it was and is unconstitutional. That is the vice, Mr. President, of offering under the 10-minute rule such amendments as the Senator offered with reference to this matter, because I was thoroughly in favor of the principle and would be delighted to vote for the proposition if it could be made to conform to constitutional principles, and I am fully satisfied that it can be accomplished in another way which is constitutional. But I am clearly of the opinion, for what it is worth, that as it stands it will not survive the test of the court, and I do not think that anybody can sustain it for a moment except upon the theory that in this emergency the Constitution of the United States is practically no guide at all to legislation here and should not be. Upon that I want to call attention to a single paragraph——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Idaho will indulge the Chair, the Senator from Idaho having exhausted his time upon the original amendment, the Chair recognizes that the Senator is now speaking upon his own amendment.

Mr. BORAH. I am under obligations to the Chair.

I read from the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Ex parte Milligan:

> Those great and good men foresaw that troublous times would arise, when rulers and people would become restive under restraint and seek by sharp and decisive measures to accomplish ends deemed just and proper, and that the principles of constitutional liberty would be in peril unless established by irreparable law. The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future. The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine, involving more pernicious consequences, was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government.

The old, vicious, hellish doctrine of necessity, Mr. President, has been the instrumentality by which every free government acting upon free principles has been destroyed in the past. There is scarcely a bill that can be presented here as to which the plea of necessity can not be urged.

> Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false; for the Government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority.

Mr. President, there is not a single power necessary to be exercised in time of war that the Constitution does not provide for. There is no power essential to putting down rebellion or to the carrying on of war which the fathers did not foresee. They themselves had just come out of a war; they were students of those powers; they understood perfectly that this Republic would some time have to meet these emergencies, but, notwithstanding that fact, they provided in the Constitution how they should be met, and met by constitutional means and methods. There is no necessity of overriding the provisions of the Constitution. Every power essential to the carrying on of this war is found here, and is provided for. The reason why we go outside of it is because we do not like the method which the fathers provided. We prefer a different system, a different method, a different means by which to accomplish our ends. Now, we can do that if we desire by changing the Constitution, but we can not do it until we do change the Constitution, except we undermine the pillars upon which free government rests. We may ignore the Constitution, we may disregard it, we may usurp and destroy our Constitution; but it is idle, perfectly idle, to talk about proceeding under the Constitution and at the same time ignore any provision which seems to stand in our way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado as amended.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I realize that the Senate is weary and anxious to vote upon the pending question and upon the bill, but I have not taken any of the time of the Senate and I shall ask for only a few moments to express myself with regard to the practical solution of this question.

Mr. President, ever since I came to Congress we have had before us the question of hedging and the question of selling and trading in futures. No producer whom I know would have any objection to dealing in futures if an actual delivery were to be made; but as to the 15 or 20 exchanges which we have in the United States, is there any Senator here who will deny that in each and every one of those exchanges ten times more grain is being sold than the total amount of grain in existence in the entire country?

What effect does that have upon prices? Let us for the sake of argument take a crop such as we had last year, when we produced less than the real consumption of the country. Everybody knows that we consume in this country each year for bread and seed about 650,000,000 bushels of wheat, to say nothing about the rye which is used in making bread. We produced last year less than 700,000,000 bushels of wheat. Now, if 10,000,000 bushels were placed upon the market for sale, and that is constantly being done, what effect will that have upon the price?

Suppose we produce 600,000,000 or 700,000,000 bushels, and there are offered for sale 10,000,000 bushels. Of course, that is not actual wheat, but as is being done in the usual fictitious way for speculation, and not a Senator here will deny that that is the practice, although perhaps in not quite so large volume as that.

The Senator from Montana asked how we would transact our business. I will tell the Senator how we could transact our business. We have to-day two systems, two selling agencies. One is the recognized chamber of commerce and board of trade. The producers of the country have become dissatisfied with those exchanges, so much so that they have organized independent selling agencies. There is in the city of St. Paul a selling agency which does not allow dealing in futures. This selling agency sells directly to the actual consumers of wheat, which are the mills. I repeat, it does not deal in futures.

Now, let us see. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has told the Senate about open markets, and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has been telling us that these transactions are in the interest of the producer. I find no fault that the Senator from Pennsylvania did not yield to me to state my position, because his time was limited; but now I desire to tell the Senator from Pennsylvania how the transactions are being carried on, not theoretically but actually. In the State from which I come we produce more wheat, more grain, than any other State in the Union, and necessarily we are very much interested in this question. The farmers of my State and the adjoining States are dissatisfied with the selling agencies now in existence. That no man will deny. They have organized an independent selling agency where no trading in futures is allowed. That agency sells its actual product direct to the consumer, which means to the mills. To show how the selling agencies now in existence exercise control, I want to say that the men operating this independent selling agency can not sell to the large mills of the country their product, and I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania and to the Senate that the 15 or 20 agencies which exist in this country are not only trading agencies but they have absolute control of the markets of this country.

The big mills in the city of Minneapolis—and I state this upon the authority of Benjamin Drake, attorney, and J. C. Crites, manager for this selling agency, in letters written to me—the big mills of the country actually and absolutely refuse to buy from this independent selling agency. The terminal elevator which they own has only a limited capacity. It would soon be all filled up, and unless they can dispose of their product to the little mills spread over the country they could not buy; but that is the actual condition.

I have no objection, Mr. President, to the boards of trade so long as they confine their activities to legitimate business. I might even think that they would be helpful to the producer, provided they were prohibited from dealing in options, in transactions which are only so much wind and in connection with which no delivery is made and no delivery is ever expected to be made; and I believe that this amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, as it has been amended by the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Idaho, ought to be incorporated in this bill.

I want to say to the Senate that the food question is an important question in this war. I want to say to you, upon information that will not be controverted, that the allies expect us to supply them with 600,000,000 bushels of grain for this year. How are we going to do it?

Mr. President, some Senator said that there was no moral turpitude involved in this matter. I believe there is. I believe, sir, that it is fundamentally wrong to permit gambling. I do not say that dealing in futures is gambling if actual delivery is made. I believe that the great mills of the country should be permitted to make contracts for future delivery, and that they in return should be allowed to sell their finished products in foreign countries or wherever they please for future delivery. Those are legitimate transactions. But when the board of trade in the city of Pittsburgh or in the city of Minneapolis or in the city of St. Louis or elsewhere sells one hundred times as much wheat as is produced in the entire United States it is illegitimate business and the public will have to pay for it.

Last fall we knew as much about how much wheat had been produced in the United States in 1916 as we knew two months later, and no man will controvert the statement that the farmers of the United States have not received an abnormal price for their grain for 1916. The spring-wheat crop was small; and in the face of that I do not believe that when the figures have been made by the Secretary of Agriculture he will say that the farm price for the product of 1916 will exceed $1.25 a bushel. We know what the millers have had to pay. We know that there has been gambling going on in these food products. We know that somebody somewhere has taken advantage of the situation and raised the price. Why, last Friday cash wheat sold in the city of Chicago at $3.40 a bushel, and you should not complain because the miller is charging you $15 or $16 a barrel. It takes four and a half bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour; so, figure it up.

Mr. President, I believe that it is fundamentally wrong to allow these people, dealing in such an important food product as grain, to absolutely control prices, because that is what they do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is compelled to inform the Senator from North Dakota that his time has expired.

Mr. GRONNA. Have I taken 10 minutes? Well, I am very sorry, Mr. President. I had just begun to say what I wanted to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At a later time the Chair will be glad to recognize the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I wish to take just a moment to express my very hearty approval of the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I am glad the Senator from Colorado accepted it, for the reason that it removes all doubt of the constitutionality of the amendment as amended. Now, whether or not the thieves are sent to jail for robbing the people in the matter of speculating in grain does not cut so much figure as the fact that the Congress is declaring itself against the pernicious practice. The adoption of this amendment will be a declaration of policy which necessarily will be productive of good; and such legislation, I think, will have a most salutary effect.

As I said, the amendment offered by the able Senator from Idaho removes the question of doubt as to the constitutionality of the amendment offered my the Senator from Colorado. I am glad it was accepted by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and I trust the Senate may now agree to the amendment as amended.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question and have him answer it in my time.

Mr. GRONNA. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. McLEAN. Is it the Senator's idea that this speculation in futures raises the price of wheat?

Mr. GRONNA. Sometimes it raises it and sometimes it lowers it.

Mr. McLEAN. Take the present condition. Does the Senator think that the speculation has raised the price of wheat higher than it would be if the sale of futures were not permitted?

Mr. GRONNA. I am free to say that if the wheat had been in the farmer's hands or in the miller's hands the price of wheat would not have been nearly so high as it is to-day.

Mr. McLEAN. Is there any exchange for the sale of potatoes?

Mr. GRONNA. No; I do not understand that there is.

Mr. McLEAN. Potatoes, I know, have risen from $1.25 a bushel to $3.50 or $4 a bushel.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; but that is hardly a fair comparison. The Senator knows that last year we did not produce one-fourth the supply necessary for our own consumption. Of course, we produced sufficient wheat for ourselves in the United States.

Mr. McLEAN. It is assumed now, I take it, that the present crop of wheat will not be sufficient for our own consumption.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; for our own consumption.

Mr. McLEAN. I know the Senator has studied this subject very carefully.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I have.

Mr. McLEAN. And I should be glad to know whether he is convinced that any other food product we have which has risen greatly in value would have brought a higher price than is at present charged if there had been speculation in futures in regard to it.

Mr. GRONNA. Let me say to the Senator that the farmers of my State sold their potatoes last fall at from 75 cents to $1 a bushel. That was the price they received for them. But the farmers in the western country, if they can get cars, do not as a rule hold their supply of potatoes. They sell their potatoes in the fall of the year; and I know the Senator from Minnesota will bear me out in that statement. We did not receive to exceed $1 per bushel for the best potatoes in the year 1916; but when they got into the hands of somebody else—I do not know who bought the potatoes—then they went up to two and three dollars a bushel.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask for the reading of the amendment which I have heard was offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I have not heard it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask the gentleman at the Secretary's desk kindly to read the amendment of the Senator from Idaho.

The SECRETARY. On line 2 of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], after the word "association," the Senator from Idaho proposes to insert the words "transacting business in a way as to be subject to the regulative power of Congress," so that the amendment would read:

That all boards of trade, chambers of commerce, stock exchanges, or other bodies or associations transacting business in a way as to be subject to the regulative power of Congres engaged in or permitting speculations in food products—

And so forth.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I want to say a word, addressing myself to the amendment. The amendment is quite proper. If the Senator from Colorado will give me his attention for a moment I will state that I have attempted to draft a provision which I think will reach the point he is trying to provide for, so that the section would read as follows:

Whenever hereafter during the present war the President shall find that any board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association is engaged in or permitting, through facilities afforded by it, speculation in food products of any character in the form of what are known as futures, or in any other form or character, it may be suspended until the President, by proclamation, shall declare the existing war to have ended.

That is to say, put the power somewhere to determine whether there is somebody violating this provision or not. The draft, as thus proposed, ought to be amended so as to incorporate the provision submitted by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I stated a few moments ago that I was quite anxious to conform, as far as possible, to such phraseology as would remove the various objections offered to the principal subject matter of this amendment, and I will accept that amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator from Montana will incorporate the amendment which I suggested.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, it is with that understanding.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I drafted it just after the language of the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado and without the language proposed by the Senator from Idaho. It would still need some little change; but I presented this in order to get before the Senate the idea that I am trying to impress upon them.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the present amendment as I offered it does that; but, as I say, I wanted to secure, if possible, an affirmative vote without utterly destroying the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question. By whom is it to be determined whether these transactions fall within the regulating power of Congress? Is it to be determined by the President?

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, I presume that in the first instance the President would determine that. I presume ultimately it might be a question which the courts would have to determine.

Mr. KNOX. I did not understand in exactly what part of the amendment those words were inserted. I could not hear it when it was stated. Then the idea, as I understand, is that whenever the President shall determine that a particular exchange is conducting transactions which are within the regulative power of Congress, and so forth, he may suspend it?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I do not intend to enter into any discussion. I am not opposed to the purpose and principle of this amendment, but I think it is in crude form, and that the matter should be considered and legislated upon in connection with the food-conservation and food-supply bill that we are expecting to have before the Senate. It relates to the same subject, and should be grouped with that, in order that the legislation may be homogeneous and consistent and cover the whole field.

I do not think this legislation has any place on this bill, and for that reason I shall vote against it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the objection which, it seems to me, has been made with relation to the amendment as it was offered by my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] relates to the fact that there might not be a workable proposition contained in the amendment. In other words, while we are all opposed to dealing in futures and speculation with respect to the necessities of life, which have a tendency to increase the price to the consumer, yet, notwithstanding that, there are a great many people who think that that might seriously disturb conditions and that it might not work.

I have an amendment which I want to suggest, which I will not offer at the present time; but after the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana is disposed of, if it is not adopted, I should like to have my amendment considered. It is to put in, after the word "suspended," the words "during the existence of the present war, unless the President, by proclamation, shall suspend the operation of this section."

We are likely to take a vacation of four or five or six months; and when Congress is not in session, if there should be a disturbance of conditions by reason of closing these boards of trade, it might be an imperative necessity that they should be opened under certain promises which might be made to the President. For that reason it seems to me that to give him the power to suspend the operations of this part of the act during the war, if he desires, or for any other length of time, would be a proper safeguarding of the public interests. That would make the amendment read in this way:

That all boards of trade, chambers of commerce, stock exchanges, or other bodies or associations engaged in or permitting speculations in food products of any character in the form of what are known as futures, or in any other form or character, are hereby suspended during the existence of the present war, unless the President, by proclamation, shall suspend the operation of this section—

And so forth.

Mr. President, it seems to me that that is a wise provision, in view of the fact that we may not be in session for a period of time of four or five months, and this amendment might not work as we hope it will work. Inasmuch as the President would have the power, under my amendment, to suspend the operation of this part of the act until Congress convenes, or until some other legislation is enacted or other promises made by them, it seems to me that it would be an excellent thing as an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana is not adopted—that amendment being somewhat similar to, but not adopting the language of, the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]—it seems to me that this amendment should be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado is before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado tell me how the board of trade is to tell whether or not the person who sends the order to buy or sell a food product is engaged in speculation?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, of course no law can be devised which may not present opportunities for evasion. I can readily perceive how contracts may be framed with a view of getting around the statute and at the same time accomplish the object which the statute is designed to do away with. But the greater part of these transactions which are known as futures, if I am correctly informed, take place through the operation of brokers upon the floors of the different exchanges—the Board of Trade of Chicago, the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis, and similar institutions. If they are made, for instance, for grain, we will say, to be followed by deliveries in September, and the quantities which the contracts deal in are out of all proportion to the estimates of the amount of grain which the year's crop will produce, that seems to me to be obviously such speculation in futures and in substances which have no existence except for purposes of speculation as to be within the terms of this prohibition.

I do not pretend that it would be possible, in all instances, so to discriminate between contracts which are for actual delivery and those which are not; but if the amendment becomes a law, the requirement of actual delivery instead of settlement, as is usual in speculative trades, under the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota, in my judgment, will reach the difficulty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] proposes to add a new section to Chapter VII, as follows:

SEC. 4. That all boards of trade, chambers of commerce, stock exchanges, or other bodies or associations engaged in or permitting speculations in food products of any character in the form of what are known as futures, or in any other form or character, are hereby suspended until the President, by proclamation, shall declare the existing war to have been ended, and all agreements, wagers, and contracts for wagers regarding food products of this character now and heretofore made in or upon such exchanges, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, or other bodies or associations by the members thereof are hereby prohibited pending such proclamation. Any person, board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association willfully violating the provisions of this section, or any of them, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not to exceed $10,000.

The thought in my mind as I read the amendment, having just come upon the floor, is this: The amendment purports to suspend the boards of trade if they permit speculation in food products of any character or form. Now, I do not see how any board of trade or exchange, even if it has a by-law prohibiting speculation in food products, can tell whether it comes under the provisions of this act or not, or can tell when it is rendering itself liable to the penalty of the act, for this reason:

Take the case instanced by the Senator from Colorado. A broker in Chicago receives an order to buy or sell a certain quantity of food products on the board of trade. How is that broker to know whether the party from whom he receives the order is making a speculative or an investment purchase? How is he to know whether he designs to use that grain in a flour mill or whether he intends, after holding his warehouse receipts for a few weeks, to sell it for a profit? How can the governors or managers of the produce exchange know anything about the purpose of the broker who comes on the floor and makes a bid to buy or sell grain or to execute an order? When is it speculative, and when is it not?

Now, you have here a penal statute.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, the Senator is aware that these institutions have the power to make, and do make, by-laws, rules, and regulations of their own for the control of the action of their various members; and surely, for the purpose of preventing any violation of this statute, they have abundant power to guard themselves against the possibility of incurring the consequences of the statute through the exercise of that power.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am not well acquainted with——

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. KIRBY. Would it be more difficult for the exchange to ascertain whether the broker was violating this law than it would for the saloonkeeper who sells liquor to a man who is 6 feet tall and weighs 190 pounds and has whiskers all over his face to determine whether or not he is a minor? He is bound to know whether or not he is a minor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, Mr. President, suppose a great flouring mill orders several million bushels of wheat, through its broker, to be bought on the Chicago Board of Trade. Suppose it is bought. Suppose, after holding that grain for a month, the buyer makes up his mind that the price of grain is going down, and that he has made a mistake in purchasing it, and he sells the grain on the board of trade on his judgment that he can buy it back again the next week at a lower price; is that man speculating? Is the board of trade which allows that order to be executed permitting speculation in a food product in any form?

I, for one, am willing to do, and, of course, we must do everything we constitutionally can do, now and in the future, to make the best use of the Nation's food supply to render it a national asset; but in the case of an amendment of this kind, thrown upon the floor of the Senate here under the 10-minute rule, affecting every produce and stock exchange in the United States, I think it behooves the Senate to proceed with some caution. I think the question of regulating the food supply of this Nation, if it is to be taken up by Congress—and I think very likely it will have to be—ought to be taken up after a broad survey of the whole field; and I think it is a subject of sufficient magnitude to warrant the best intellectual effort that can be made by this Congress, advised by the departments of the Government as to what, in their opinion, may be necessary.

I feel the utmost hesitancy in voting for an amendment of this kind, which, I think, we all admit is not thoroughly understood by any Senator on the floor.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUSTING in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. Is it the Senator's understanding that warehouse certificates are always issued in these transactions?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator please, he uses the phrase "these transactions." The amendment which I am speaking about refers to transactions for future deliveries or speculations of any other kind; so that I do not know whether a warehouse receipt is always delivered in all speculative transactions or not.

Mr. GRONNA. I take it that it would be perfectly legitimate to sell for future delivery providing there was a warehouse receipt delivered, because if a warehouse receipt was delivered the grain would have to be actually in existence; but that is not the way the business is being done.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I take the Senator's word for that. I know the Senator is familiar with the details, but I am not. What I am saying is that the prohibition in this proposed amendment is not only against sales for future delivery or speculation in futures, but speculations in any form. I think it is very indefinite.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The amendment of the Senator from Minnesota protects against that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have not that here.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is for actual delivery. That qualifies it all—for actual delivery.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well; it may be so, Mr. President.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is so. It was offered for that purpose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator's amendment is:

Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the actual sale or purchase of commodities in good faith for actual future delivery and where the products are to be delivered instead of settled for as is usual in speculative trades.

Of course, Mr. President, it must be borne in mind that even with that amendment on the proposed amendment, the question is, Which exchange has got to go out of business now? The exchanges that permit any speculation in these products are hereby suppressed. I think it is calculated to throw the whole business of the country where food products are dealt in into the utmost confusion.

As I said before, if this subject is to be gone into, it should be gone into after careful investigation and consideration by a responsible committee of this body. I do not think on a bill which is designed by the Department of Justice to prevent violations of our neutrality rights, which was drawn before the war broke out in this country, on a bill designed to prevent espionage of our military places, all questions which may arise in the future during the conduct of the war should be offered in this frivolous way on the floor of the Senate under a rule limiting debate to 10 minutes.

If there is any disposition on the part of the Senate to get through with this so-called espionage bill, they had better confine their attention to that bill. We have attempted under that bill to put a censorship upon the press of the country, but now we are proposing to regulate the whole food supply of the country on a spy bill. This question has not been suggested or recommended to the Senate or to the Judiciary Committee as a part of the pending bill. It has been suggested to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, who have conducted a considerable investigation on it, who have had food experts before them, and they either have reported or are about to report a bill which I understand has been investigated and has the recommendation of the department. I think we ought to wait and deal with this subject on that bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have put in form the amendment which I suggested hastily to the Senator from Colorado, and which seemed to meet his approval. I will read it rather than send it to the desk, because it was written hurriedly and may not be very plain to the Secretary.

Strike out all of the proposed amendment down to and including the word "ended" and substitute for the same the following:

Whenever hereafter during the present war the President shall find that any board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association transacting business in such a way as to be subject to the regulative power of Congress, engaged in or permitting through facilities afforded by it speculation in food products of any character in the form of what are known as futures, or in any other form or character, it may be by order of the President suspended until he by proclamation shall declare the existing war to have ended.

I offer this amendment, Mr. President, and want to say a word upon it. It does not express my idea; I am trying to express the idea which the Senator from Colorado desires incorporated in the bill. I do not want to suspend absolutely every board of trade in the country, but only to suspend those that permit the inhibited transactions, and to lodge somewhere the power to tell whether this board offends or whether that board is innocent. In the amendment proposed the power is lodged in the President of the United States. That presents the very important question as to whether the power ought to be lodged in an executive officer of the Government or ought to be lodged in the courts upon a proper proceeding brought.

My own judgment about the matter is that the Constitution would compel the lodging of the power in the courts. I do not believe that you can pass a law putting boards of trade out of existence; that is to say, associations of men who get together for the perfectly lawful purpose of permitting the buyer and seller to come together in a room in a building and with the facilities which they afford for that purpose. That is a legitimate business. Of course, it is turned into most illegitimate transactions, but you can not prohibit that kind of thing except by a judgment of the courts. But that presents a most important question.

I say again I am endeavoring to present the idea of the Senator from Colorado and not my own, but I want to put the provision in some shape that will not offer by the very ipse dixit of Congress to put out of existence every association of this character in the country that is engaged in legitimate or illegitimate transactions and enterprises.

But, Mr. President, this is intended as a corrective only of a certain part of the bill. I want to call your attention to a part that I tried to put in some sort of shape so that it could be understood even, and I have utterly failed. I refer to what follows. Observe, Mr. President:

And all agreements, wagers, and contracts for wagers regarding food products * * * upon such exchanges, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, or other bodies or associations by the members thereof are hereby prohibited pending such proclamation.

That is to say, Mr. President, if you make a transaction of this character on the board of trade it is void, but if you go out on the street and make exactly the same kind of a contract it is perfectly valid.

Then observe the penal clause as it was in the amendment as it was prepared and even as I have endeavored to correct it. The thing is absolutely inoperative:

Any person, board of trade, chamber of commerce——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I dislike very much to interrupt the Senator, but the Senator knows that the evils existing have not taken place on the street. The Senator knows that the trade in futures, which deals in something which does not exist, is being done in the boards of trade and chambers of commerce.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate what the Senator says, but that is not the point I was trying to make. I am calling attention to the language of the statute that is intended to correct the evil which he so justly denounces. It goes on:

Any person, board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association willfully violating the provisions of this section, or any of them, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, * * *—

Mr. President, what does that mean?—

board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association willfully violating the provisions of this section, or any of them.

How does a board of trade violate the provisions of this section? There is nothing that it permits. It does not say that any board of trade permitting those things shall be guilty of anything at all, but a board of trade "violating the provisions of this section."

I inquire of the Senator from Colorado where is a board of trade that in the past has permitted these things? Any board of trade that permits these things shall be deemed guilty of a violation of this act. The only thing that the board of trade is denounced for is for permitting these things to go on, and thereby it is suspended during the continuance of the war. I want you to attend to the language:

And all agreements, wagers, and contracts for wagers regarding food products of this character now and hereafter made.

What does "now" mean? I suppose the Senator intends that the making of contracts in the future, such as are now being made upon the board of trade, shall be void; but the language is—all such contracts now made and hereafter made shall be void.

That is to say, contracts which have already been entered into of that character which are now perfectly valid this law attempts to make void. Nobody need say that it is utterly impossible to do that. I do not know whether that is what this language means or not. I imagine what the Senator intended was that contracts made in the future of the character of those which have been permitted in the past shall be deemed void; but he has not used the appropriate language to express that idea. My effort to improve it has been futile up to the present time. However, it will improve it somewhat if the substitute I offer for the first portion of the amendment is agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. WALSH. I note that the Senator from Colorado is absent from the Chamber. I should not like to ask for a vote in his absence.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The senior Senator from Colorado is down in the Committee on Finance and I have sent for him. I am authorized to say for him that the first part of the amendment which is offered is acceptable to him. I see he is entering the Chamber now.

Mr. THOMAS entered the Chamber.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that the Secretary read the proposed amendment to the amendment for the information of the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Beginning with the word "That" in line 1, strike out down to and including the word "ended" in line 7 and insert the following:

Whenever hereafter during the present war the President shall find that any board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association transacting business in such a way as to be subject to the regulative power of Congress, engaged in or permitting through facilities offered by it speculation in food products of any character in the form of what are known as futures, or in any other form or character, it may be by order of the President suspended until he by proclamation shall declare the existing war to have ended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let me ask the Senator from Colorado, the author of the amendment, to look at line 8 and state what the words "of this character" refer to. It now reads "and contract for wagers regarding food products of this character."

Mr. THOMAS. Food products of any character. I refer the Senator back to line 3.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It simply uses the words "food products of any character." Why does not the Senator say "such products"?

Mr. THOMAS. I think that would improve it. I will change it to conform with the Senators' suggestion and say "products of such character." I ask leave, in line 8, to strike out the words "of this character" and insert the word "such" between the words "regarding" and "food."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the amendment will be so modified. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. WALSH. May I ask the Senator what is the significance there of the words "now and"? If those are out, it would read "contract for wagers regarding such food products hereafter made."

Mr. THOMAS. "Now and hereafter made"—now in existence.

Mr. WALSH. Is it the purpose of the Senator to declare void the contracts now existing?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly. I do not think any of these gambling contracts now in existence and unperformed should be recognized or permitted. They ought to be abolished.

Mr. WALSH. I inquire of the Senator whether we can render void those contracts?

Mr. THOMAS. In the first place, the contracts themselves are not valid if they are gambling contracts.

Mr. WALSH. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. Very good; I was sure the Senator would. That being the case, I am not attempting to void a contract; I am providing that its recognition and enforcement shall be unlawful and shall be punishable under this section

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] as amended.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not desire to delay the proceedings here, but there have been so many amendments suggested, and so much discussion as to the meaning of this word and that word—so many criticisms and changes of words—that I should like to have the amendment, or what is left of it, read in a clear manner, that the Senate may see what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whenever hereafter during the present war the President shall find that any board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association transacting business in such a way as to be subject to the regulative power of Congress engaged in, or permitting through facilities afforded by it, speculation in food products of any character in the form of what are known as futures, or in any other form or character, it may be by order of the President suspended until he by proclamation shall declare the existing war to have ended, and all agreements, wagers, and contracts for wagers regarding such food products now and hereafter made in or upon such exchanges, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, or other bodies or associations, by the members thereof are hereby prohibited pending such proclamation. Any person, board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association wilfully violating the provisions of this section, or any of them, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not to exceed $10,000: Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the actual sale or purchase of commodities in good faith for actual future delivery and where the products are to be delivered instead of settled for as is usual in speculative trades.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In view of the way in which the language of the amendment as originally proposed by the Senator from Colorado has been changed I do not myself quite see the relevancy of the penalty clause on page 2. It will be borne in mind that as the amendment now stands when the President has found the fact in relation to any of these exchanges it is to be suspended. After that exchange has been suspended and is out of business, how can it violate any of the provisions of the act?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, this is a very high-sounding amendment, but if we analyze it we will find it is perfectly abortive. The boards of trade and chambers of commerce in their collective capacity as such boards and chambers of commerce do not speculate or deal in futures. The speculation is carried on by members who have seats in the stock exchange or board of trade, and you do not attempt to reach them at all by this amendment. You simply refer to chambers of commerce and the members of stock exchanges. They can come into court and say, "We as a stock exchange and members of the board of trade have never perpetrated any of these offenses. It is true some of the members may have done so, but in our collective capacity we have never done it."

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator overlooks the use of the word "permits." It is aimed against the permission of such practices by its members.

Mr. WADSWORTH. How can a board of trade permit a thing to be done when the board has been suspended?

Mr. THOMAS. It can not legally, but it may attempt it; and we want this penalty for the purpose of seeing that the order of suspension is observed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not sure that the point is at all well taken, but it seems to me that after the President had found a fact, and upon that has suspended an exchange, the penalty ought to follow the disobeying of the order of the President and not the commission of an act for which there might be a penalty if the same had not been suspended.

Mr. THOMAS. The order of the President merely puts the statute into operation. Consequently, the penalty should be aimed at a violation of the statute after it becomes operative through the President's proclamation.

Mr. KNOX. May I ask the Senator from Colorado in what does permission consist?

Mr. THOMAS. I presume, if the Senator and I were members of a stock exchange and we made a contract forbidden by this amendment upon the floor of the exchange, it would be permitted.

Mr. KNOX. Then, as I understand it, if the exchange has a rule against such transactions the exchange could not be said to have permitted it.

Mr. THOMAS. Probably not. I think the exchange can make such a rule, and if it enforces it there need be no danger of anyone incurring this penalty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado as amended.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	McLean	Sherman
Bankhead	Gronna	Martin	Shields
Borah	Hale	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Harding	New	Smith, Md.
Broussard	Hardwick	Newlands	Smith, S. C.
Calder	Husting	Overman	Sutherland
Chamberlain	James	Page	Thomas
Colt	Johnson, Cal.	Phelan	Thompson
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Townsend
Cummins	Kendrick	Poindexter	Trammell
Curtis	Kenyon	Pomerene	Underwood
Dillingham	King	Ransdell	Vardaman
Fernald	Kirby	Reed	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Knox	Robinson	Walsh
France	La Follette	Saulsbury	Wolcott
Frelinghuysen	Lewis	Shafroth
Gallinger	McKellar	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the object which Senators have in view with presenting this amendment, but not knowing what it means and not having heard of any Senator upon the floor who does know what it means, and understanding as I do that the proper committee is considering this same question, I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think that the purpose underlying the amendment, the suppression of transactions in the nature of speculations on exchanges in food products, is a commendable one, but the debate here to-day, and especially the discussion on the part of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], has disclosed to my entire conviction the futility of attempting to dispose of questions of this sort in the manner we are now considering them.

This is a very important question, and I should like to have it dealt with effectively and fairly. I believe that that will be done upon the consideration of the measure which is expected to succeed the espionage bill. I believe that when the bill reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is under consideration this subject can be intelligently and successfully dealt with. I doubt whether the pending amendment will accomplish anything of benefit. Speculation in food products must be stopped. This provision will not accomplish that end. The subject is too important to justify the Senate in voting an inadequate and unavailing provision such as this seems to be.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, just a word also in explanation of the vote which I am about to cast on this amendment. I am not satisfied with the amendment as it is. I appreciate the spirit which animated the Senator from Colorado in framing the amendment and in seeking a remedy for a very flagrant evil. I have understood that the Agricultural Committee will report out a bill covering this subject completely. I look forward with eagerness to the time when we can vote for that bill, or at least for a bill which will entirely protect the public from the practices of these gamblers in food products. I hope the bill will have real teeth in it, and I will challenge any Senator to go further than I will go when that legislation comes before this Chamber.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has brought before the Senate the most important question of the day, second only in importance to the declaration of war—the question of supplies with which the war is to be conducted and the supplies of the people themselves.

Mr. President, my belief is that we shall have to take very radical action in this direction; that we shall have to govern not only the price of food, but the price of lumber, the price of fuel, the price of iron and of steel, as well as of copper. There are other subjects of commerce that may be of equal importance, but certainly without these we can not conduct war at all, nor can we maintain and support the people themselves who are actually engaged in the war.

What is the fact? The fact is that an extraordinary demand has been imposed upon a limited supply. The effect of that is to raise the price abnormally. The demand being above the supply there is no limit to which the price of a commodity can go unless some other commodity equally efficient at a reduced price can be substituted for it. Right here we are going to find a difficulty in our dual government in the fact that the Congress of the United States has jurisdiction only over interstate commerce, whilst the jurisdiction over State commerce belongs to the States. With reference to transportation, the power of the Nation controls, probably, it is estimated, 85 per cent; but with reference to commodities the proportion must be very much less. No adequate regulation of prices can be made without the cooperation of the States. It will be necessary, therefore, for us to devise some very well thought out scheme under which the national authorities, in the exercise of their jurisdiction over interstate commerce, will cooperate with the State authorities in their jurisdiction over purely State commerce with a view to regulating the prices.

Then, again, we are met by the difficulty that if the industries in which these commodities are produced are threatened with regulation of prices and perhaps possibly a noncompensatory price, they may not use their exertions to the same extent in producing the desired things. They may view with apprehension, possibly, as I have no doubt the iron and steel industries would, a great enlargement of their plants when the interposition of peace within a few months would entirely withdraw the extraordinary demand. So it will be necessary, in connection probably with this regulation of prices, to fix a guaranty of a certain minimum price for a certain period, so as to stimulate the production of the desired commodities.

Mr. President, these things can not be determined on this floor in debate upon the consideration of a question having an entirely different purpose. So far as I am concerned, sympathetic, as I am, with the purposes of the Senator from Colorado in introducing this amendment, and thankful, as I am, to him for calling the attention of the Senate to its importance, I shall feel compelled to vote against his amendment in order that the Senate may give this subject the consideration and the thought that it deserves.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I do not like to be placed upon the record as opposing the principle involved in this amendment, but for the past week or two the Committee on Agriculture, of which I am a member, has been devoting itself to hearings which involve the question in this amendment and others that are akin thereto. I feel that before voting "nay" I should make the explanation I do. I therefore am going to say that I hope the amendment will not pass. I hope the subject may be taken up under the bill which is soon to come forward from the Committee on Agriculture. I am sure it will then command a full consideration and that we shall then be better able to pass upon this question than we shall be under the amendment which is now proposed.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I merely wish to say a word on the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I am very glad that the Senator has offered that amendment. I am sure when the matter goes to conference that the committee of conference will be able to bring out something for which we can all vote. I think it is only fair to Senators here, however, to say that I know of no bill before the Agricultural Committee touching upon this question directly. There is a provision in section 1 of the so-called food-control bill, which I understand has not yet been printed—although it was reported out on Saturday—but the only place I can find in that bill which touches upon the question of prices is in section 1, only a portion of which I will read:

> And to protect them against injurious speculation, manipulations, and controls affecting such supply, distribution, and movement—

And so forth.

Mr. President, the bill provides against and prohibits waste; it provides for standardization of food products; it authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to grant permission to mix other agricultural products in the manufacture of flour; but I do not believe that any Senator will contend that there is a single provision in the so-called food-control bill, which has been reported to this body, that would prohibit the practices of dealing in futures and which are now going on in the different boards of trade and chambers of commerce.

I would just as soon vote for an amendment or for a provision such as has been proposed by the Senator from Colorado on the food bill as I would vote upon it and embody it in this bill; but until I have some assurance that this body is willing to consider such an amendment and to place it upon the food bill, which has been reported from the Agricultural Committee, I shall vote for the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. President, I believe this is one of the most important pieces of legislation that this body could enact. We who have had actual experience with this infamous condition, with this robbery of the American people of their money—for that is all it is—and with a condition that makes it possible for the speculators to depress prices to the producer and to enhance prices to the consumer, now can there be anything more important than that in times of peace as well as in times of war? Why are the agricultural people dissatisfied? If the condition is as has been painted by some Senators here this afternoon, if there is really no cause for complaint, why is there dissatisfaction among those who are actual producers?

Mr. President, there is no bill before the Agricultural Committee, so far as I know, which could take the place of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado. For that reason I shall vote for the amendment, and I trust that the Senate will adopt it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, there is not a Senator in this body whose service here antedates the evil practices that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is designed to prohibit. Year after year, term after term, decade after decade, this subject has been before the Congress of the United States. What a reflection upon representative government? It can never be presented in a form that seems acceptable to the Congress. It must always be deferred to some other time, some better opportunity; it must come from some other committee; it must be postponed for some reason or other.

What is the evil that is sought to be remedied here? We shall produce this year, according to the latest word from the Agricultural Department, less than 600,000,000 bushels of wheat. Now, leave out of consideration the question of foreign demand and look at it purely as a matter of fair dealing among the producers, the middlemen, and the consumers. We shall produce this year less than 600,000,000 bushels of wheat according to all the authority which we have before us that is at all reliable. According to the testimony which has been taken by the Committees on Agriculture of both branches of Congress for the last 25 years there is sold every year from ten to twenty times as much wheat as is produced in this country. Now, just stop a minute and think what that means to the man who raises it. Six hundred million bushels will be raised, and there will be 6,000,000,000 bushels sold if this amendment or some other law prohibiting it does not pass. It will not be wheat for delivery; it will be a cold-blooded gamble in wheat at the expense of the producer. The result of this excessive selling depresses prices while the grain is in the hands of the farmer. Then when the farmers have sold their wheat at a low price fictitious deals can be further made to advance the price of the wheat to the consumer.

Mr. President, nobody suffers in this transaction excepting the producers and the consumers of the country, and between the two those who speculate in futures, who buy and sell accordingly as the bulls and bears have control and make their profits gather unlimited fortunes. Those transactions would be prohibited by this amendment.

Suppose this proposed amendment is not perfect in its terms. Let us endeavor to perfect it. When the Senate really desires to improve the text of a bill it finds very little difficulty in doing so. It is chiefly a matter of willingness to legislate upon a subject. If the Senate wants to legislate it always dispatches business rapidly. If there is strong opposition from even a few Senators, they are able to find a great deal of fault with its phraseology or object that the measure is of doubtful constitutionality. This amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has been having a hard time of it. Complaint is made that its terms are vague and uncertain; that it can not be considered under the 10-minute rule; that it is unconstitutional; that it belongs on some other bill; that we ought to put it off. No one is quite ready to defend the grain gamblers, but we hear the same reasons for postponing consideration of this measure which have been heard here for decades.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that we might, in the interest of the people who produce these 600,000,000 bushels of wheat, who only receive from 70 cents to $1.25 a bushel at the outside, while the speculators sell it for two to three dollars a bushel—it seems to me that we might, in the interests of the millions of people who are consumers and who are now paying double prices for bread, see in this amendment a real opportunity for service and employ all of the ability and skill of the Senate to work out something that shall be a real protection to the public.

Mr. President, what I have said would apply to peace conditions; but we are going to need to conserve food supplies, we are going to need to bend every energy of this country to meet the conditions of the war upon which we have entered. I do not know whether it caught the attention of Senators this afternoon when one Member of the Senate said that he would trench upon what was perhaps confidential and say that it had been stated before the Committee on Agriculture that the allies had to have 600,000,000 bushels of wheat. Do you get that? Do you understand that that is all we will produce? Are you going to permit a set of speculators, who have fattened illegally and wrongfully off the American people for more than a quarter of a century, to go on with their nefarious speculative business while this war is upon us and the world is threatened with starvation?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] as amended, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRONNA (when the name of Mr. NORRIS was called). The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is necessarily absent from the Chamber. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I desire to inquire whether the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement as to my pair and its transfer which was made upon the last vote, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. I desire to inquire if he has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. JAMES. In view of his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then, I withdraw my vote, having a pair with that Senator.

Mr. CURTIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to know if the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. CURTIS. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. KENDRICK (after having voted in the negative). I wish to ask whether the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 48, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. THOMAS as amended was rejected.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, just before adjournment Saturday evening I called the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to page 36 of the bill, in line 14, the first proviso. I wanted to ask him if what I regard as an error in the phraseology has been corrected yet. It reads:

Provided, That whoever shall violate the provisions of this paragraph of this section in time of war shall be punished by death—

And so forth.

Now, it will be observed that the whole of section 2 is one paragraph, but the various subdivisions—(a), (b), and (c)—contain different penalties, and I think it is an oversight.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish the Senator would call my attention to the line. There is so much confusion that I was unable to tell what part of the bill he referred to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There is so much conversation around me that I can hardly hear or make myself heard.

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped for order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The words occur in line 15. The language is:

Whoever shall violate the provisions of this paragraph of this section—

Now, there is only one paragraph in the whole section. The whole section is one paragraph, consisting of three subdivisions—(a), (b), and (c)—and the violation of the provisions of each subdivision has a different penalty imposed.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think it is intended to mean the subdivision, "whoever shall violate the provisions of this subdivision."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If we were to strike out the words "this paragraph," and substitute in lieu thereof the words "subsection (a)," it would accomplish the purpose, I think.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think that is correct. I accept that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 36, line 15, the amendment of the committee is modified by striking out the words "this paragraph" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "subsection (a)."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I simply want to say that I wish to reserve the right to ask for a separate vote on subsection (c).

The VICE PRESIDENT. There can be no separate votes on this. It is one amendment, and one alone.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to reserve the vote by which subsection (c) was stricken from the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But that can not be done. The Senator can offer it as an amendment in the Senate. He can not reserve it, however, because there is only one amendment here.

Mr. BORAH. Then, Mr. President, under the ruling of the Chair, I need not attempt to make the reservation I had in mind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is perfectly clear. There is just one amendment, and when it is concurred in, if it is, in the Senate it is then open to all sorts of amendments, just as it was before.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know that; but I think it has been the universal practice that when there is an amendment striking out an amendment to the bill it has been reserved in the Senate for a separate vote on that amendment. Still I can offer it in the Senate just as well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; or it can be offered now.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know whether anyone has made a reservation with respect to the so-called Cummins amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled that there can be no reservation for separate votes. This being simply one amendment, amendments may be offered now or they may be offered after the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole is concurred in.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I inquire whether the appropriate time to tender amendments will be after the bill is in the Senate, before the amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole is concurred in, or after it is concurred in?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is now in the Senate, and the amendment is now in order, if it is desired to present it at this time.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. I will state, in offering it, that it is the same amendment that was finally adopted, known as the Cummins amendment to the censorship paragraph in Chapter II, subsection (c). I ask the Secretary to read it. It is the same amendment that was stricken out of the bill upon the motion of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

I hope the vote will be taken without debate. The matter was debated for a long time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 37, line 5, after the word "years," it is proposed to insert the following——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The bill being in the Committee of the Whole, and this subsection having been stricken out by vote of the Committee of the Whole, is it in order to move to reconsider it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been reported to the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not understand that.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following words:

In time of war, the President is hereby authorized to prescribe and promulgate rules and regulations for the purpose of preventing the disclosure to the public, and thereby to the enemy, of information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, and disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States in naval or military operations, or with respect to any works intended for the fortification or defense of any place; and whoever, in time of war, shall willfully violate any such rule or regulation shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, on that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the request seconded?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to say a single word, simply to explain the vote I am about to give.

I voted to strike out paragraph (c) as originally reported; and day before yesterday, I think, or Friday, when this question was up, with some hesitation I voted to keep it in in the modified form which it had assumed by the substitution of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

I say I voted with hesitation. I felt it was necessary that there should be some proper protection against the publication of information useful to the enemy. But since I cast that vote I have had occasion to examine with some care the publication which is coming out from the Bureau of Information, if that is its name, which I state to be the board of censors, and I have come to the conclusion very distinctly that it would be far better not to have any legislation of this sort than to permit that board to exclude, as they will have the power to exclude, practically anything from the newspapers of the country.

The fact that there is given the right to go to the courts is really no protection. The threat of a suit would be all-sufficient, and I do not care to leave the publication in the newspapers at the mercy of that board. I have therefore decided that I shall vote to strike the whole passage from the bill; that is, to keep it as it went into the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, was the request for a yea-and-nay vote seconded?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was; but the Chair, in accordance with the uniform practice, never announces it until the Chair is certain that the discussion has ended.

Mr. BORAH. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President. There are some 8 or 10 Senators absent, and I think we ought to have a call of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	Kellogg	Nelson
Bankhead	France	Kendrick	New
Beckham	Frelinghuysen	Kenyon	Overman
Borah	Gore	King	Page
Brandegee	Gronna	Kirby	Phelan

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-three Senators have answered to the roll-call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to what is known as the Cummins amendment, on which the yeas and nays have been requested.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, it is impossible to make a connected argument on a question so important as the one that is now presented to the Senate in the limited time allowed by the rule, and I shall not undertake to do so. I shall not attempt to exploit my own opinions, but I will read some excerpts from the works of some of the greatest commentators upon the Constitution bearing upon the constitutionality and policy of the proposed law.

I first read from Cooley on "Constitutional Limitations." Everyone recognizes the authority of this work. Judge Cooley was one of the greatest constitutional lawyers this country has produced. Speaking of the amendment to the Constitution forbidding Congress to enact any laws abridging the freedom of speech and the press, he says:

The first amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides, among other things, that Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press. The privilege which is thus protected against unfriendly legislation by Congress is almost universally regarded not only as highly important but as being essential to the very existence and perpetuity of free government. The people of the States have therefore guarded it with jealous care by provisions of similar import in their several constitutions, and a constitutional principle is thereby established which is supposed to form a shield of protection to the free expression of opinion in every part of our land.

Again, this distinguished jurist says:

An examination of the controversies which have grown out of the repressive measures resorted to for the purpose of restraining the free expression of opinion will sufficiently indicate the purpose of the guaranties which have since been secured against such restraints in the future. Except so far as those guaranties relate to the mode of trial and are designed to secure to every accused person the right to be judged by the opinion of a jury upon the criminality of his act, their purpose has evidently been to protect parties in the free publication of matters of public concern, to secure their right to a free discussion of public events and public measures, and to enable every citizen at any time to bring the Government and any person in authority to the bar of public opinion by any just criticism upon their conduct in the exercise of the authority which the people have conferred upon them. To guard against repressive measures by the several departments of the Government, by means of which persons in power might secure themselves and their favorites from just scrutiny and condemnation, was the general purpose; and there was no design or desire to modify the rules of the common law which protect private character from detraction and abuse, except so far as seemed necessary to secure to accused parties a fair trial. The evils to be prevented were not the censorship of the press merely, but any action of the Government by means of which it might prevent such free and general discussion of public matters as seems absolutely essential to prepare the people for an intelligent exercise of their rights as citizens.

* * * * * * *

If any such principle of repression should ever be recognized in the common law of America, it might reasonably be anticipated that in times of high party excitement it would lead to prosecutions by the party in power, to bolster up wrongs and sustain abuses and oppressions by crushing adverse criticism and discussion. The evil, indeed, could not be of long continuance; for, judging from experience, the reaction would be speedy, thorough, and effectual; but it would be no less a serious evil while it lasted, the direct tendency of which would be to excite discontent and to breed a rebellious spirit. Repression of full and free discussion is dangerous in any government resting upon the will of the people. The people can not fail to believe that they are deprived of rights, and will be certain to become discontented, when their discussion of public measures is sought to be circumscribed by the judgment of others upon their temperance or fairness. They must be left at liberty to speak with the freedom which the magnitude of the supposed wrongs appears in their minds to demand; and if they exceed all the proper bounds of moderation, the consolation must be that the evil likely to spring from the violent discussion will probably be less, and its correction by public sentiment more speedy, than if the terrors of the law were brought to bear to prevent the discussion.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to read briefly from Black's Constitutional Law, in which he quotes from Judge Story's great work upon the Constitution:

"It is plain," says Story, "that the language of this amendment imports no more than every man shall have a right to speak, write, and print his opinions upon any subject whatsoever, without any prior restraint, so always that he does not injure any other person in his rights, person, property, or reputation, and so always that he does not thereby disturb the public peace or attempt to subvert the Government." According to the Supreme Court of Ohio, "the liberty of the press, properly understood, is not inconsistent with the protection due to private character. It has been well defined as consisting in the right to publish with impunity the truth, with good motives and for justifiable ends, whether it respects government, magistracy, or individuals." As respects criticisms upon public officials or the government of the State or country, however, it is now thoroughly understood that freedom of the press includes not only exemption from previous censorship but also immunity from punishment or sequestration after the publication, provided that the comments made keep within the limits of truth and decency and are not treasonable. The importance of this guaranty as a protection against tyrannous oppression and as a mainstay of popular government can not be exaggerated. Says the same learned commentator: "A little attention to the history of other countries in other ages will teach us the vast importance of this right. It is notorious that event to this day in some foreign countries it is a crime to speak on any subject, religious, philosophical, or political, what is contrary to the received opinions of the government or the institutions of the country, however laudable may be the design or however virtuous may be the motive. Even to animadvert upon the conduct of public men, of rulers, or representatives in terms of the strictest truth and courtesy has been and is deemed a scandal upon the supposed sanctity of their stations and characters, subjecting the party to grievous punishment. In some countries no works can be printed at all, whether of science or literature or philosophy, without the previous approbation of the government."

* * * * * * *

"In the United States no censorship of the press has ever been attempted or would for a moment be tolerated. It is clearly and indubitably prohibited by the constitutional provisions under consideration."

Says the same learned commentator:

The only known example in America of an attempt to restrain seditious publications was the sedition law of 1798. This act of Congress provided for the punishment of all unlawful combinations and conspiracies to oppose the measures of the Government or to impede the operation of the laws, or to intimidate and prevent any officer of the United States from undertaking or executing his duty. It also provided for a public presentation and punishment by fine and imprisonment, of all persons who should write, print, utter, or publish any false, scandalous, and malicious writing or writings against the Government of the United States, or either House of Congress, or the President, with an intent to defame them or bring them into contempt or disrepute, or to excite against them the hatred of the good people of the United States, or to excite the people to oppose any law or act of the President in pursuance of law or his constitutional powers, or to resist or oppose or defeat any law, or to aid, encourage, or abet any hostile designs of any foreign nation against the United States. But this act was one of the principal causes of the downfall of the party which enacted it, was always regarded as foreign to the spirit of our institutions, and was consigned to oblivion after a brief career without regret.

I shall not attempt to add anything to the opinions of these great lawyers and jurists. They demonstrate that Congress has no power to create a censorship of the press, and that sound public policy also forbids it. This amendment of the Constitution has not received judicial construction, because Congress has never violated it. This is the most flagrant attempt that has ever been made to do so.

The constitutional conventions of the States have almost without exception construed it to prohibit censorship or previous restraint upon the freedom of speech and the press, and so declared by express provisions in the constitutions framed by them, providing only for responsibility for the abuse of the right.

I will here read the provisions found in some of the State constitutions upon this subject. The following are the constitutional provisions:

Maine: Every citizen may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on any subject, being responsible for the abuse of this liberty. No law shall be passed regulating or restraining the freedom of the press; and in prosecutions for any publication respecting the official conduct of men in public capacity or the qualifications of those who are candidates for the suffrages of the people, or where the matter published is proper for public information the truth thereof may be given in evidence; and in all indictments for libel the jury, after having received the direction of the court, shall have a right to determine, at their discretion, the law and the fact. (Declaration of Rights, sec. 4.)

New Hampshire: The liberty of the press is essential to the security of freedom in a State; it ought, therefore, to be inviolably preserved. (Bill of Rights, sec. 22.)

Vermont: That the people have a right to freedom of speech and of writing and publishing their sentiments concerning the transactions of government; therefore the freedom of the press ought not to be restrained. (Declaration of Rights, art. 13.)

Massachusetts: The liberty of the press is essential to the security of freedom in a State; it ought not, therefore, to be restrained in this Commonwealth. (Declaration of Rights, art. 16.)

Rhode Island: The liberty of the press being essential to the security of freedom in a State, any person may publish his sentiments on any subject, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty; and in all trials for libel, both civil and criminal, the truth, unless published from malicious motives, shall be sufficient defense to the person charged. (Art. 1, sec. 20.)

Connecticut: No law shall ever be passed to curtail or restrain the liberty of speech or of the press. In all prosecutions or indictments for libel the truth may be given in evidence, and the jury shall have the right to determine the law and the facts, under the direction of the court. In all criminal prosecutions or indictments for libels the truth may be given in evidence to the jury; and if it shall appear to the jury that the matter charged as libelous is true and was published with good motives and for justifiable ends, the party shall be acquitted, and the jury shall have the right to determine the law and the fact. (Art. 1, sec. 8.)

New Jersey: Every person may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right. No law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press. (Art. 1, sec. 5.)

Pennsylvania: That the printing press shall be free to every person who may undertake to examine the proceedings of the legislature or any branch of government, and no law shall ever be made to restrain the right thereof.

The free communication of thoughts and opinions is one of the invaluable rights of man, and every citizen may freely speak, write, and print on any subject, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty. No conviction shall be had in any prosecution for the publication of papers relating to the official conduct of officers or men in public capacity, or to any other matter proper for public investigation or information, where the fact that such publication was not maliciously or negligently made, shall be established to the satisfaction of the jury; and in all indictments for libels the jury shall have the right to determine the law and the facts, under the direction of the court, as in other cases. (Art. 1, sec. 7.)

Delaware: The press shall be free to every citizen who undertakes to examine the official conduct of men acting in public capacity, and any citizen may print on any such subject, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty. (Art. 1, sec. 5.)

Maryland: That the liberty of the press ought to be inviolably preserved; that every citizen of the State ought to be allowed to speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that privilege. (Declaration of Rights, art. 40.)

West Virginia: No law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press shall be passed; but the legislature may provide for the restraint and punishment of the publishing and vending of obscene books, papers, and pictures, and of libel and defamation of character, and for the recovery in civil action by the aggrieved party of suitable damages for such libel or defamation. Attempts to justify and uphold an armed invasion of the State, or an organized insurrection therein during the continuance of such invasion or insurrection, by publicly speaking, writing, or printing, or by publishing or circulating such writing or printing, may be by law declared a misdemeanor, and punished accordingly. In prosecutions and civil suits for libel the truth may be given in evidence; and if it shall appear to the jury that the matter charged as libelous is true and was published with good motives and for justifiable ends, the verdict shall be for the defendant. (Art. 2, secs. 4 and 5.)

Kentucky: That printing presses shall be free to every person who undertakes to examine the proceedings of the general assembly or any branch of the government, and no law shall ever be made to restrain the right thereof. The free communication of thoughts and opinions is one of the invaluable rights of man, and every citizen may freely speak, write, and print on any subject, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty.

In all prosecutions for the publication of papers investigating the official conduct of officers or men in a public capacity, or where the matter published is proper for public information, the truth thereof may be given in evidence; and in all indictments for libels the jury shall have a right to determine the law and the facts under the direction of the court as in other cases. (Art. 13, secs. 9 and 10.)

Tennessee: Nearly the same as Pennsylvania. (Art. 1, sec. 19.)

(Art. 1, sec. 11.)

Iowa, Art. 1, sec. 7, and Nevada, Art. 1, sec. 9, substantially same as Ohio.

Illinois: Every person may freely speak, write, and publish on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty; and in all trials for libel, both civil and criminal, the truth, when published with good motives and for justifiable ends, shall be a sufficient defence. (Art. 2, sec. 4.)

Indiana: No law shall be passed restraining the free interchange of thought and opinion, or restricting the right to speak, write, or print freely on any subject whatever; but for the abuse of that right every person shall be responsible. (Art. 2, sec. 10.)

Subsection (b) of section 2 of chapter 11 of the bill provides for the punishment of publication of facts which will prejudice our Government and aid the enemy. It is as follows:

(b) Whoever, in time of war, with intent that the same shall be communicated to the enemy, shall collect, record, publish, or communicate, or attempt to elicit any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct, or supposed plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense or calculated to be, or which might be, directly or indirectly, useful to the enemy, shall be punished by death or by imprisonment for not less than 30 years.

What more protection is needed than that afforded by this provision? It is ample and will be effective for all purposes.

A state of war does not authorize the Congress or other branch of the Government to suspend the Constitution of the United States. The guaranties of that great instrument are as inviolable in war as in peace, and all three of the branches of the Government must conform to them at all times and under all circumstances.

There is no provision of the Constitution which confers upon the Congress power to enact laws in time of war affecting the personal and property rights of citizens which it could not enact in times of peace. This does not seem to have been disputed since the great case of Ex parte Milligan, reported in Fourth WaHace, was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States.

I do not question the power of the military commander in war, when confronted by imperative military necessity, to make stringent rules for the government of persons and to seize property for military purposes, but compensation must be made and the power ceases with the compelling necessity.

The Government also has the right to proclaim martial law or rule for the whole or a portion of the country temporarily, when the civil authorities are unable to cope with existing conditions caused by insurrection or invasion, and thus suspend the constitutional guaranties for the time being and power exercised not authorized by the civil law; but martial rule must cease when the civil authorities have so far recovered as to maintain order and administer the law and otherwise control prevailing conditions.

The Congress or the Commander in Chief of the Army in an emergency may proclaim martial rule under such circumstances and under such limitations, but Congress has no power to enact laws which in effect abrogate the Constitution and vest in any branch of the Government arbitrary powers when the civil authorities are able to cope with the situation and no imperative necessity, such as the existence of the State, is involved. There is no insurrection and no invasion impending in this country. Our enemy is 3,000 miles across an ocean and beleaguered by our allies, and no case is now presented for the drastic legislation which is proposed by this chapter of the bill.

Mr. Willoughby, in his work on the Constitution, says:

Under the stress of military exigency, upon the actual theater of war, such civil guaranties as the writ of habeas corpus, immunity from search and seizure, etc., may, of course, be suspended. As to this there is no question. There is, however, a serious question whether, when war exists, these rights may, by legislative act or Executive proclamation, be suspended in regions more or less remote from active hostilities. This question was raised and carefully considered in the famous Milligan case, in which the Supreme Court was called upon to pass upon the authority of a military commission during the Civil War to try and sentence upon the charge of conspiracy against the United States Government one Milligan, who was not a resident of one of the rebellious States nor a prisoner of war, nor ever in the military or naval service of the United States, but was at the time of his arrest a citizen of the State of Indiana, in which State no hostile military operations were then being conducted.

The military commission had been created pursuant to an act of Congress of March 3, 1863, authorizing the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus throughout the United States by the President, but providing that lists of persons, not prisoners of war, held under military authority should be furnished within a given time to the judges of the Federal circuit and district courts, and that one so imprisoned whose name was not thus reported might appeal for release to the civil courts.

Five of the justices of the Supreme Court held that Congress was without the constitutional authority to suspend or authorize the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, and provide military commissions in States outside of the sphere of active military operations and with their civil courts open and ready for the transaction of judicial business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, as I intend to vote against this amendment, I think it is my duty to myself, as well as a measure of respect to the eminent lawyers of the Senate who have argued the question of the constitutionality of such a measure, to indicate that my vote is not predicated upon any view of the Constitution that precludes the adoption of this amendment.

It seems to me, Mr. President, to be perfectly clear—and I make this statement with diffidence, although I have given considerable thought to the matter since it was first mooted here—that the Constitution must always be construed in such a manner as to give effect to all of its powers. The war power in the Constitution stands upon the same authority as the other powers in the Constitution, and it is a sound and well-recognized rule of construction of any instrument that, if possible, it must be construed so as to give meaning to all of its parts.

When the fathers said in the Constitution that Congress should have the right to declare war, and that it alone should have that power, they did not undertake to define what war is, or what constitutes war. They dealt with a status that was well known; and when the Constitution conferred upon Congress the right to declare war, it by necessary implication conferred upon Congress the right to do anything that in its judgment was necessary to carry that war to a successful conclusion.

The war powers of the Constitution, in my opinion, are dormant until a status of war is declared by Congress; and then they may be exercised without limitation or qualification to the extent that the safety of the Nation demands. Of this, Congress is the judge, except as the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, in the actual conduct of the war, and in a case of great emergency or dire necessity may be compelled to act. By this construction of the Constitution, Mr. President, the Constitution itself is preserved in its entirety. Indeed, the exercise of the war power is the only way in which the Constitution can be preserved. Madison said, and I quote from Paper 41 in Lodge's Edition of the Federalist:

If a Federal Constitution could chain the ambition or set bounds to the exertions of all other nations, then indeed might it prudently chain the discretion of its own Government and set bounds to the exertions for its own safety.

But, as Madison said:

It is in vain to oppose constitutional barriers to the impulse of self-preservation. It is worse than in vain, because it plants in the Constitution itself necessary usurpations of power, every precedent of which is a germ of unnecessary and multiplied repetitions.

Or, stated in simpler language, if you undertake to impose in the Constitution limitations on the power of self-preservation, the very fact that those limitations exist causes them to be set aside and creates a precedent for violation of the Constitution.

Those, Mr. President, are the views that I entertain, and they constitute the lamp by which my feet shall be guided in all war legislation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KNOX. In just one moment. It is not because I think we lack the power to pass this legislation but because I think the necessity does not exist. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask the Senator a question. Does the Senator mean to say by his argument that Congress could pass any law which, in its judgment, it thought was necessary for the carrying on of the war?

Mr. KNOX. Not in those terms. My position is that the Congress of the United States, after a war has been declared, may pass any law which it believes is necessary for the preservation of the Nation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. NORRIS's name was called). I wish to announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is unavoidably absent from the city, and if present and permitted to vote he would vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I am informed by the Senator's colleague and also by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] that if he were present he would vote as I will vote. I am therefore at liberty to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement as to my pair and its transfer made on the last ballot, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] and let my vote stand.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JAMES. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 48, as follows:

So Mr. OVERMAN's amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. I move to strike out the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] which was adopted in Committee of the Whole known as section 1 of Chapter XIII. I ask that the amendment be read as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah moves to strike out the section of the bill, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike from the bill Chapter XIII, section 1, in the following words:

That on and after September 1, 1917, and during the period of the war with the Imperial Government of Germany it shall be unlawful to use or employ, directly or indirectly, any cereal, grain, sugar, or sirup in the production of intoxicating liquor in any form or of any kind: Provided, That nothing in this section shall prevent the use of sugar or sirup in the manufacture of wine as now authorized by existing law: Provided, however, That this section shall not be construed to make unlawful the manufacture of alcohol or intoxicating liquor for industrial, mechanical, medicinal, sacramental, or scientific purposes, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. A violation of this section shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment of not more than three years, or both.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words before this question is voted on.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa in the bill does not address itself to my mind as a real conservation of the food supply of the country. I should be disposed to support a provision of that kind if it was within the constitutional power of the Government to do so. I recognize that under the taxing power of the Constitution we may limit the production of grain or the use of grain for certain purposes by putting a tax on it. That is a question which would address itself to the Committee on Finance of the Senate in the consideration of the revenue bill.

I do not believe the Government of the United States possesses the power of general regulation that is proposed in the pending paragraph which the Senator from Utah proposes to strike out. Therefore I am opposed to the consideration of the matter at this time, and I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Utah.

But, aside from that provision, I do not believe as it is presented here it is a real conservation measure. A large portion of the grain that is used in the distillation of spirits is afterwards used for the feeding of cattle. In the making of beer the grain used is barley, and that is not used in this country to feed human beings with and is but seldom used as a cattle feed. The other component part of making beer is hops which neither cattle nor men use as a food product. Therefore, I do not believe that there will be any saving of food supplies by the adoption of the amendment.

On the other hand, the effect of the adoption of the amendment is to confiscate many million dollars' worth of property. To begin with, we would turn out of employment a large number of people who are engaged in the business that the amendment affects, and more than that, it would destroy the revenues of the Government entirely that are obtained from the sale of beer, amounting to more than a hundred million dollars, at a time when we need all the revenue we can get.

It has been stated here that this is not a prohibition question. The argument might be made by those who advocate a law of this kind from a prohibition standpoint that it is worth while to make the sacrifice for the ends to be obtained. But there is nothing to be accomplished by the amendment, because we all know that there is a supply of several years of whisky in bond, and the man who wants to drink liquor and has been in the habit of drinking beer will be driven to the consumption of whisky, which certainly is not a temperance proposition.

I believe it is unwise for the Government to approach this subject in this way, either from the question of conservation of food products or as a temperance proposition. The conservation of food products, if it is approached at all by the Congress at this time, ought to be approached through the revenue measure to be submitted to the Senate.

As a temperance proposition many of my colleagues on the floor of the Senate do not agree with me, but I think all these temperance proposals should originate in the States and meet with the approval of the local communities and the State governments before they are enacted into law.

I therefore regard the proposal that is in the bill as ineffective as a conservation measure, as an unwise proposal from a temperance standpoint, and as a very disastrous proposition from the standpoint of the revenues of the Government.

I shall therefore vote in favor of the motion of the Senator from Utah to strike the paragraph from the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, one has but to remember the full-page advertisement contained in the morning newspapers to understand the kind of campaign which since Saturday night last has been waged against this amendment. Whether the publication to which I refer has had any effect upon the Senate I do not know. I hold in my hand at this moment the Washington Times, issued on the afternoon of Monday, May 14, and here [exhibiting] are two pages signed by "The Brewers of the United States," in type that can be read across the Chamber, directed to the so-called Cummins amendment.

Mr. President, I said all that I have to say upon this subject upon Saturday. I am not moved by the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] with regard to confiscation. At the most, there is only a cessation of activity in the production of liquor for the period of the European war. It is idle to insist that this suspension of an activity, which I do not regard as praiseworthy at any time, is a confiscation of the property of those who are manufacturing intoxicating liquor.

Mr. President, the fact that there will be some men out of employment, so far as the production of liquor is concerned, does not alarm me in the least. We are about to withdraw from the productive element of American society 1,600,000 men or more. We have already provided for their withdrawal. There is great scarcity, and there will be great scarcity, of workmen to carry on the various industries of the United States, industries that I think are infinitely more worthy than that of distilling or fermenting liquor. Our industrial society can absorb with perfect ease, and cry for more, all the men who will lose employment because the breweries and the distilleries are for a short period closed.

Mr. President, I close—I have not intended to make an argument upon the amendment; we discussed it all day Saturday—I close with a parliamentary inquiry. This bill is in the Senate. My inquiry is whether the amendments agreed to as in Committee of the Whole have been agreed to in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has come to the Senate and is now being amended in the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. The amendments agreed to as in the Committee of the Whole have not, therefore, been agreed to in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the bill came to the Senate it came as one amendment; it did not come as different amendments.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then the amendment which is now sought to be stricken out has been, together with other amendments made, adopted in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it was adopted as in Committee of the Whole, and has been reported out of the Committee of the Whole to the Senate. It is now pending in the Senate, subject to amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. The point of my inquiry was whether the right to attack this particular amendment had been reserved by any Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It could not be reserved, for the reason that there came but one amendment from the Committee of the Whole. The only way to reach anything now is by amendment in the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was curious to know the parliamentary status, and therefore my parliamentary inquiry. I hope that those who believed on Saturday that, for a time at least, the United States should suspend the effort to consume foodstuffs in the manufacture of liquor, still believe that we ought to cease this nefarious enterprise, at least during the war.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the amendment which I offered this morning was, just before the bill was reported to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole, defeated. If I comprehend the reasons for the defeat of that amendment, they consisted of the assertion that it had no place at this time in this bill, but more properly belonged to a bill reported by the Agricultural Committee. That amendment, Mr. President, was quite as appropriate as the one which was offered by the Senator from Iowa on Saturday and which is now the subject of discussion. I trust those who defeated the amendment which I offered upon the ground that it had no place as a part of this bill may be consistent in their vote upon the pending amendment.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, this amendment is fraught with such grave consequences to a great number of the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent that I do not think I should be doing my duty unless I rose in protest against it. I want to make it clear that I am ready to vote for any sacrifice that is necessary for the proper defense of this country, and I am sure that the people of Wisconsin are ready to make any sacrifice that is necessary; but in doing so they do not want to sacrifice the welfare and happiness of a great number of the people of the State of Wisconsin for something that is not based on necessity, but which is urged here only because of a desire on the part of those favoring prohibition to take advantage at this time of the situation to foist a prohibition law upon the statute books, even though it means the ruthless destruction of vast property rights and involves the happiness and prosperity of thousands of people.

There is a strong sentiment here in favor of prohibition; I am willing to concede it; but Senators on the other side must also concede that there is a strong sentiment against prohibition in the United States. Let us call it even, and it is nearly so, even for the sake of argument let us concede that it preponderates a trifle on the side of prohibition.

Now, that we are engaged in war, is it wise by an unjust act and an inconsiderate, if not wanton, act to divide the people of the United States upon a question that has no business here? We are engaged in a war that requires a strong feeling of unity throughout on the part of all. Vexatious domestic questions ought to be relegated to the rear and only legislation calculated to promote our success in arms should be passed now. None else should be considered even. We want to draw together our people, not drive them apart; and every Senator here knows that there is scarcely anything that has so aroused bitterness and dissension among our people as the prohibition question. It should be let alone now. And nothing of the kind should be enacted unless a pressing—yes; imperative and vital—necessity should demand it. But there is no such showing made here. But there is a showing that the passage of this amendment, on the other hand, would mean disaster and ruin to many. True, it has been said that this bill will not do any lasting damage to the industry. I want to say right here and now that if the brewing interests of this country are suspended for three years they will be absolutely ruined; the men working for them will be thrown out into the streets; the property will be scrapped; and disaster and ruin will fall upon thousands of people. You can not restore this industry in three years from now. It must be obvious that if this amendment passes the breweries will close, their agencies will close also, their large force of skilled workmen will be scattered and dissipated, and their entire business scrapped.

Why is this amendment brought in at this time? It is brought in here, we are told, to help the allies and to conserve foodstuffs for the allies. If that is true, then it must be that the allies have already taken steps to conserve their food supply in this manner; but what are the facts? The facts are that Canada is using barley; England is using barley; France is using barley; Russia is using barley; Italy is using barley. For what? For the brewing of beer. They are rationing out beer to their troops, but here we are told that we must save our barley to enable them to ration their troops with beer which they are going to brew from our barley.

What are we accomplishing by this provision? We are destroying our breweries; we are causing a money damage of over a billion dollars; we are discharging hundreds of thousands of men and putting them into the world at a time when living is so high that it is hard to make ends meet; we are taking the barley market away from the farmers of the West; we are turning away about $350,000,000 of internal revenue; we are making paupers of thousands of large income-tax payers, all for what? Why, so that our farmers will be compelled to ship their barley to Canada for our allies; to England for our allies; so that they may buy American barley at their own figures and brew beer from our barley for their own troops, or to sell the beer back to this country at any price they may see fit to fix. Not only that, Canada, England, and France will get the internal revenue out of it that otherwise would have come to us. You would close our malting plants so that the barley may be malted in the countries of the allies. Notwithstanding that our farmers have already planted their barley, without notice of any proposed change, you are going to cut off their home market and tell them they must either feed it to the hogs or sell it to our allies for beer and at whatever price they choose to pay. Where do we gain and where does prohibition gain us anything by that? We are simply doing something that is absolutely indefensible from the standpoint of those who advocate this proposal as a food conservation measure.

What are we going to say to the people of this country who do not believe as gentlemen do who are in favor of prohibition and who are engaged in industries connected with this business? What are we about to say to them? We are about to say to them, "We are going to take your property away from you; we are going to take your market away from you; we are going to turn your raw material over to the allies, so that they may use it in just the same manner that we forbid you to use it." Is there anything fair about that? Is there anything sensible about it? I protest against that proposition.

If it is necessary to conserve the barley supply of a country for food, why has not England done so? Why has not Canada done so? Why has not France done so? Their commissions are here visiting us, and we hear a great deal of talk about following in their footsteps.

Now, do we want to go wild upon this matter and refuse to permit our people to do something, on the ground that it is for the interest of the allies, when the allies are doing just exactly what it is proposed to forbid our people doing? You can not defend that before the people of the country. What will you say to them when you ask for further taxation to meet the deficit of $350,000,000 internal revenue resulting from the amendment, and they, in return, demand to know why you want to make them burn their candle at both ends? They will want to know why you turned millions of internal revenue over to the allies, why you cut off our markets and our people's profits in the interest of foreign countries, destroying over a billion of dollars' worth of property and throwing hundreds of thousands of people out of employment, and then topped it off with an additional levy of $350,000,000, and you will not be able to answer them satisfactorily, because you will have to admit that you did it not to conserve foodstuffs—because it does not conserve, it merely diverts—not because it proposes to stop drinking during the war, because we can import from Canada and from the allies. You will have to admit that you did it because, under the guise of conservation, you would deal this business a death blow.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Wisconsin, of course, recognizes the fact that all the countries he mentions—Russia, England, Germany, and France—have all restricted and placed limitations upon the amount of grain that may be used in the brewing of beer during this war?

Mr. HUSTING. Then, for Heaven's sake, restrict it here if you want to do so; but do not absolutely destroy, do not wipe this business out entirely. You are swinging the pendulum clear over to the other side. Is it not an absurdity to say that we, who are just entering into this fight, shall compel our people to desist from doing something so that other countries may use the very things that we refuse to allow our own people to use, and in the manner and for the purpose we refuse to allow our people to use them and letting our allies do the things that it is proposed to deny our people the right to do? You can not justify it.

I desire to say again that I am willing to go as far as any man in this Chamber in voting for what is necessary; but I want something that I can defend, and I say this is indefensible, because it is unjust and because it is not right. You can not go before the people of this country and explain why you have taken away from them rights on the ground that it is for the benefit of the allies when the allies have not seen fit yet in the interest of conservation to prevent their people from doing what we now propose to prohibit our people from doing for our allies' benefit. It is not fair.

This matter has not been considered fully here. Under the 10-minute rule this matter can not be properly presented; but the men who have invested millions of dollars, the men who are working at this trade—and whether you like it or whether you do not cuts no figure—have rights that even you have got to respect. They are not outlaws; they are men who have been recognized as engaging in legitimate business; and in the name of fair play and common sense, I say that we have no right ruthlessly and pitilessly to take their property from them and drive hundreds of thousands of people out into the streets without a chance to make a livelihood.. I want to say further that this is a bad time to divide the people by enacting legislation along this line. The question of national prohibition is too big and vital a question to be fastened as a tail to another legislative kite. It should be considered on its own merits, and if the time shall come when or if it shall be necessary to take away our rights like the one in question, let there at least be consideration shown to the victims of the act and a positive showing and conviction that the sacrifice is imperative.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will undertake to give the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] a defense for this provision. It seems to be generally conceded that there is not going to be bread enough during this war for all the people of this country, those at home and in the field, and for all the people of the allied nations at home and in the field—that is, not as much bread as they need and ought to have in order to be strong and efficient. If the people of a certain community were short of water, if there were not enough water to supply everybody, so that some would have to go thirsty, I do not believe that anybody would give his approval to a proposition to take a part of the limited quantity of water available, at most only partially sufficient, and turn it into poison, which would diminish the supply of water, and would not only not do the people any good but would do them actual harm. I think that is all there is in this question. That is all there is to it. That is all that can be made of it. That is an absolutely fair illustration. No further argument is needed. That gives the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] the ground on which this provision may be defended, for which he has been inquiring.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has had his 10 minutes.

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to ask the Senator from Montana a question.

Mr. MYERS. I will respond with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. HUSTING. I want to ask the Senator if he understands that barley is being used for making bread in this country or in any other country?

Mr. MYERS. No; I can not say that barley is being used for making bread; but it can be used for many other purposes, I understand, than making beer. It can be used for feeding live stock, thus increasing our meat supply. I am sure hogs will eat it.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator allow me to answer that question?

Mr. MYERS. I am glad to yield to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. He is a farmer and can speak from experience.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say, for the information of the Senator from Wisconsin, that, mixed with wheat and rye, it is being used in European countries for food purposes to the extent of 30 per cent of the production.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not know whether there is any use in talking further about this proposition, but I want to present this thought: The Government of the United States is attempting to float the largest loan that has ever been conceived since the world began. We are asking our people to raise $7,000,000,000—seven thousand million dollars. If a man had been born a thousand years before the Creation, according to Biblical accounts or estimates, and if he had saved a million dollars every year he would not have seven thousand million dollars to-day. The raising of this stupendous sum is in my judgment the greatest single thing that can be done for the purpose of defending our country. The war in Europe, in my humble opinion, is very likely to be practically settled before a single American soldier sets foot upon European soil. I do not claim to be a military authority, but I know from talking with at least one of the greatest military authorities living in this country that it is his opinion that the campaign now being waged on the western front may be determinative of the war. He believes that a few weeks' time may either break the force of the attacks of the allies or that the allies may break through the iron ring of the Germans, and that either one of those events is likely to determine the conflict.

Further than this, as we all know, the probabilities are that the Russian forces can not be kept in the field in good fighting order unless they are supplied with munitions of war and with money to feed and provision their people—perhaps even these aids will not avail. We can get the money and we can probably get goods to Europe in time to support our allies in the desperate conflict in which they are engaged. We can probably get them munitions of war before the great crisis of the conflict is passed. But, Mr. President, just at the time we are asking the American people to produce seven thousand millions of dollars—seven billions of money—it is proposed here to wipe out $1,000,000,000 worth of property, to unsettle credits in the United States, to throw consternation into financial and industrial circles. We are asked to do this startling thing when we are proceeding under a 10-minute rule of debate, when there is no opportunity for careful consideration, for the bringing forward of facts, and for that deliberation in judgment which is essential to the settlement of great affairs.

Men stand here and vote for this proposition and advocate it, saying it is not a temperance problem at all; and yet if you were to eliminate from it the question of temperance and were to propose to wipe out a billion dollars' worth of property in order to conserve the consumption of a few million bushels of barley—a grain that can hardly be said to be a food product—not a man in this Senate would vote for the proposition. It is regrettable that we find here men who, I fear, are willing to sacrifice the financial and industrial interests of the country at this tragic hour, when what we need is confidence, confidence, and still more confidence. What we need is solidity of business and not consternation in business circles. We find men, I say, willing, I fear, to sacrifice these great interests and thus to imperil the country in order to immediately enforce their particular moral ideas.

I am perfectly willing, under proper conditions, to sit down with these gentlemen and counsel, counsel for the sake of temperance, counsel for the sake of morality, but always to bear in mind that the supreme question to-day is the winning of this war; that the great question before the American people is to preserve the lives of our boys and keep as many of them as we possibly can from dying on the bayonet points of German soldiers. We ought to understand, as the President has in substance said to us, and as members of his Cabinet have practically said, that the greatest forces we can mass at present in this war is our force of money and our force of production. We ought not at this time, and under a 10-minute rule of debate, to proceed to destroy a billion dollars' worth of value, turn out of employment a million men, and unsettle the present industrial prosperity of the country.

When we get through with the revenue bill which we are about to pass we will have already sufficiently alarmed the capital of our country. Looking into the gallery, I see representatives of the press, which reminds me that I talked to-day with the proprietor of a great paper who presented figures which, if correct, show that his paper, together with two other great papers for which he spoke, will probably be bankrupted by the taxes proposed in the revenue bill.

Let us proceed with due care; let us do injury and impose burdens only where necessary; let us uproot evils, but let us be sure we do not create havoc in so doing; let us not pull up a hill of corn in order to get rid of a weed upon the instant, when, by a little care, we can kill the weed and yet save the corn. But, above everything else, let us not bring on a panic that will send money into hiding when the cause of our allies and our own country demands that all our financial resources be mobilized so that our cause in the great war shall triumph.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am going to detain the Senate only a moment.

I am compelled to vote in favor of striking out this amendment. I am heartily in accord with any movement which has for its purpose the restriction of the sale of liquors in this country, or the conservation of food. I am not going to detain the Senate now to state in detail why I shall vote to strike it out. Suffice it to say in a single sentence that in my judgment it is clearly in violation of the Constitution. I apologize to the Senate for referring to that instrument; but still I must for the time, until I am convinced that I am in error, observe it as my guide in casting my votes upon this floor. I am heartily in favor of prohibition of the liquor traffic not only in time of war but in time of peace. But I do not want to do a vain thing, and I feel sure this law would in the end accomplish nothing. In a few days we will have an opportunity to deal with the matter in an intelligent and effective way. When I can vote for an effective law, a constitutional law, I shall do so.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it may not be the popular thing to vote to strike this amendment from the pending bill. I shall occupy but a moment in presenting my view. I have understood that it was the privilege of the new Members of the Senate to sit at the feet of the Gamaliels and learn wisdom, and that it was the new Members' duty to preserve silence for at least a year, but to be sure to vote right. After listening for several weeks to the words of wisdom falling from the lips of able Senators, and learning the contrariety of opinion and witnessing the lack of unanimity on their part, it is quite apparent that a new Member could not vote right if he voted the way all his seniors vote. I have resolved, because of the great stress of public business and because of the necessity of securing action upon important measures at the earliest possible moment, to say nothing during this extraordinary but transcendently important session and to endeavor to intelligently act upon questions presented for consideration.

When the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] offered his amendment to the pending bill on Saturday last I had serious misgivings as to its constitutionality, and I also doubted its effectiveness either as a prohibition measure or as a food-conservation measure. Since the tendered amendment has not been considered by any committee, as I understand, an opportunity for investigating the effects of this provision if enacted into law is denied. However, being profoundly sympathetic with the announced object of the amendment, I voted for its adoption. Since then I have given more mature consideration to the question and have reached the conclusion just stated by the distinguished Senator from Idaho, that this amendment is unconstitutional. I have felt that whenever legislation is contemplated the first question should be, Is it constitutional? No matter how important it may be to obtain relief along a given line, if the plan proposed violates the great charter of our liberties it should not be enacted into law. It is not opportune, nor does time permit to discuss the constitutional phase of this matter, and I content myself by stating that in my opinion the amendment can not be defended constitutionally. Moreover, there are other serious objections to the proposed legislation.

We have been considering for weeks an important bill, coming from the Judiciary Committee. This bill dealt with the question of passports, shipping, embargoes, treason, espionage, the improper use of mails, and other important matters. The question of the conservation of food was not before the Judiciary Committee, and would have no proper place before that committee. As has been repeatedly stated upon the floor of the Senate, the Agricultural Committee has been considering the question of food conservation and of cognate matters. As I understand, this committee has given attention to the question of the powers of the Federal Government to control food supplies, and to conserve not only articles constituting food but such as enter into the life of the people. It is impossible to legislate upon this important subject without extensive investigation and the most earnest and serious consideration.

I hold no brief for the liquor interests of our Nation. Upon the contrary, I should be glad to see every State of the Union in the prohibition column. The liquor interests have been unfriendly, in the State from which I come, to the party with which I affiliate. I have no sympathy for these interests, and, as stated, would be glad to see prohibitory statutes enacted in every State in the Union. I think it can be easily demonstrated that this amendment would not accomplish prohibition and would not conserve the food supply of our country. As a prohibitory measure it is futile as well as unconstitutional, and as conserver of food it is demonstrably ineffective.

The great needs of the country for revenue require calm and wise legislation. There must be no disturbing of business more than is necessary. With the billions of dollars required in the prosecution of the war it is important that business, so far as possible, be not disturbed, and that industrially and economically the business conditions should be free from governmental control to as large a degree as possible. The war, of necessity, will dislocate business, disturb industrial activity, and produce a disquieting effect in all of the business activites of the people. Everything possible should be done to encourage business and not to discourage it. Governmental control of the industries of our country should be avoided if possible.

The Government does not want to run the business of the country and desires that the people shall conduct their own business pursuits and maintain as high a level of prosperity as possible. The greater the prosperity the greater the taxes and burdens that can be borne by the people in order to prosecute this gigantic war. Whenever it is imperative for the Government to fix prices and to control the industries and business pursuits of the country, legislation should be provided only after the most deliberate and conscientious investigation and along conservative and proper lines and based upon legal principles that can be defended when the constitutionality of the same is challenged. It may be that under the war powers of the Government such a crisis will arise as to require governmental interposition in the control of the industries and commerce and business enterprises and activities of the people. It may be that a crisis will arrive and that the Government, under its war power, may be compelled to seize the products of farm and field, of mill and mine, and fix prices and control the channels of commerce. If this should be necessary, then as stated, the greatest care should be bestowed upon legislation affecting this object and the legal questions involved should receive the scrutiny of those who feel that the Constitution of our country in war, as in peace, is the foundation of our liberty.

In my opinion a bill could be drawn that would prevent, under certain circumstances, the use of cereals and other articles of food value for the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. A broad and comprehensive measure covering the great field of food conservation and with due recognition of constitutional limitations I would support. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa will not, in my opinion, reach the evil sought to be remedied, and may, if enacted into law, help to defeat proper legislation that will secure the relief desired. The debate has shown in part its imperfections; and, primarily because of its unconstitutionality, from my point of view, I shall feel compelled to support the motion to strike out the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to strike out.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

So Mr. KING's motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I move to strike from the bill section 1, Chapter XII, on page 66. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to discuss it, but will state to the Senate that it is the section referring to nonmailable matter upon which there was considerable discussion in the Senate. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion.

Mr. OVERMAN. All I have to say is that the question was debated for two or three days and the Senate refused to strike out the section. I hope the Senate will stand by its former vote.

Mr. BORAH. The Senate has been showing some signs of returning wisdom.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho demands the yeas and nays on agreeing to his amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I have a pair, as heretofore announced, with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], and withhold my vote.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote and vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FERNALD. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is unavoidably absent and that if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. May I inquire if the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Then I withhold my vote, having a pair with that Senator.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 52, as follows:

So Mr. BORAH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In Chapter VII, page 54, at the end of section 1, I offer the following amendment, to come in after line 13 of that section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 54, Chapter VII, at the end of section 1, line 13, insert:

Provided further, That the power herein conferred upon the President to place an embargo upon the export of any article or articles from the United States to any foreign country shall in no case be used to prohibit such exports to any foreign country whose Government is at peace with the United States, when such article or articles are for the use and consumption of and within such foreign country, unless such article or articles in the judgment of the President to be so declared in his proclamation, be required for domestic use and consumption by the people of the United States, or for the use of the Government of the United States in its prosecution of the war; nor shall such power so conferred upon the President be used to interfere with the neutral rights of any neutral nation or to coerce the government of any such neutral nation, directly or indirectly to engage or participate in the existing war.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have no desire or intention of debating the amendment. I do ask, however, for a yea-and-nay vote upon it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to say that the Senate some time ago voted down an amendment of the same character. I have no objection to taking a vote by yeas and nays.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not desire to debate the question at all, but I shall be inclined to vote against the amendment because it provides for precisely what the President will do and what he ought to do under the section, as it stands, in my judgment, and without the proposed amendment, and therefore it is not necessary.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I hope it will not be debated. If it is to be debated, I will move that the doors be closed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. All I desire is a vote upon it in open session without debate. That is all I ask.

Mr. FLETCHER. All right; I am ready to vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin demands the yeas and nays on agreeing to his amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair I withhold my vote.

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as on the former vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay." I ask that this announcement may stand for the balance of this legislative day.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. REED (after having voted in the negative). I neglected to announce the transfer of my pair. I make the same transfer as on the last vote and allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 9, nays 68, as follows:

So, Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments? If not, the amendment in the nature of a substitute made as in Committee of the Whole will be concurred in.

The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am greatly obliged to the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] for having speeded the issue on my amendment so perfectly and completely. I will let the record stand upon that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. REED and Mr. SAULSBURY asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], but on this measure, if he were present, he would vote as I am about to vote. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair I withhold my vote. If my pair were here, he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Amen.

WAR REVENUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4280, the war-revenue bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the following article from the Virginian Pilot of May 13 in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

ALL PARIS TALKING ABOUT ROOSEVELT'S VOLUNTEER DIVISION—FRENCH CAPITAL EXPECTED TO OUTDO ALMOST ANY POPULAR DEMONSTRATION SINCE REVOLUTION ON HIS ARRIVAL.

PARIS, May 12, 1917.

All Paris is talking about "Teddy Roosevelt's division."

The Parisian man in the street, the discreet Government official, the Parisian housewife will all ask any American to-day the same question: "When do you think M. Teddy Roosevelt will come to Paris with that picked American division?"

It is perfectly safe to predict that Paris will outdo almost any popular manifestation in history—except possibly the French Revolution—if it has a chance to see Roosevelt marching at the head of American troops.

The popular French idea of Roosevelt dates back to Spanish-American War days. They regard him as an "ideal type of American."

Frenchmen honor President Wilson from the bottom of their hearts. They put him down as one of the greatest men in history. Newspapers refer to him in what Americans call "high-brow" language.

But without detracting one whit from Wilson's popularity here, there is a different sort of enthusiasm for T. R. Newspapers spread his name in big type, faces brighten, eyes flash.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I ask you to believe that I was unaware of what the gentleman from Tennessee was going to say. [Laughter and applause.] Nevertheless, if you will permit me to do so, I will say that I indorse the sentiments he has caused to be enunciated.

Gentlemen, I shall try not to abuse your patience. This bill has been explained in great detail by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. The debate during the past few days has been exhaustive, and it might seem that it had been even exhausting, judging from the thin attendance at the daily hour of adjournment.

I shall confine myself to as brief a discussion as possible of the general features of this measure without going into any great detail. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] the other day expressed his delight that he was able to bring this bill before the House backed up by the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Ways and Means. In that expression I join him. That Democrats, Republicans, and Progressives in times like these can act with unanimity upon a revenue bill of these unexampled proportions, affecting as it does almost every field of human endeavor, is, I think, a most fortunate thing for the country, because it shows that in times of real stress the Representatives in this House of the American people can be trusted to act as patriots and not as partisans.

The gentleman from North Carolina accounts for this unanimity in several ways, and he paid a graceful tribute to the Republican Members for declining to inject partisanship in any way into our deliberations. He neglected, however, to mention what I consider the main cause for the harmonious agreement at which we finally arrived, and that is the unfailing patience, good humor, and tact of the gentleman from North Carolina himself. [Applause.] To these he added a knowledge of detail gained evidently by the most laborious investigation of financial conditions which was to me nothing short of surprising. During the many years that I have known the gentleman from North Carolina, during the many years that we have served here together, I have thought of him principally as an able orator, an extraordinarily brilliant debater, and a fluent—and I hope he will pardon me for this—if sometimes flippant rhetorician; but I now recognize that he possesses qualities of statesmanship far higher than these, and I say to you gentlemen upon that side of the aisle that he is well fitted to guide you through the problems you face in the financing of this war. [Applause.] I do not claim for this bill, no one claims for this bill, that it is the last word in war finances. I am perfectly frank to say that there is much in it of which I disapprove; that there is little in it that I would support for a moment in time of peace; but, Mr. Chairman, we are at war and we must have money. We have been criticized for not holding public hearings. If we had held public hearings, judging from the mass of letters and telegrams that I have alone received from gentlemen in the slightest degree touched by taxation, we would have been sitting yet and not a line of the bill would have been written. Judged by the same standard, the bill when eventually completed would have been far worse than it is now, for the vast majority of these protestants seem to me entirely unable to get it into their heads that this country is at war and that it is their duty as Americans to contribute something toward its cost. We do claim for this bill that it is as carefully constructed as was possible in a limited time; that it is well balanced; that its burdens are in no case destructive of industry; and that it will without question produce the revenue it was designed to provide. The main problem which faced the framers of this bill was how to distribute the taxes necessary to raise this huge sum of $1,800,000,000 in as equitable a way as possible, so that as a general rule those best able under all the circumstances to do so would be called upon to assume the burden.

No one, I think, except the most radical socialist, would hold that these war taxes should be paid exclusively by the very rich, and, on the other hand, no one but the most selfish rich man would advocate that wealth as such should not pay the major portion of expense. [Applause.] This problem confronted us in the very beginning in the construction of the income-tax provisions, which come first in the bill. Under existing law only about 370,000 people paid any income tax whatever last year—less than one-half of 1 per cent of the population of the United States. Faced with the fact that we had to tremendously increase the tax upon higher incomes, it did not seem to us fair—certainly it did not seem to us good public policy—to compel this insignificant number of people to pay the entire war income tax, and so it was decided to lower the exemptions to a point where a reasonable number of people should be called upon to pay from their incomes something toward the national defense. This bill lowers the exemption in the case of a single man from $3,000 to $1,000 and of a married man from $4,000 to $2,000; and even thus these exemptions are far higher than they are in any other country in the world where an income tax is laid, and in no other country does so small a proportion of the population pay the tax. I shall not go into detail in this matter except to say that in no other country except America is the exemption as high as $1,000 even for married men. In most countries a fair average could be said to be about $500. In Germany, for instance, in the year before the war, with an exemption of about $500, more than 6,000,000 people paid an income tax. We believe that under this bill, with the exemptions at one and two thousand dollars, about 4,000,000 people will be called upon to pay an income tax, and the rates upon the smaller incomes will be so low that they will not be appreciably felt, I think. We decided unanimously at the beginning to as nearly as possible assess half the cost upon accumulated wealth as such, as large a proportion of the remainder as possible upon luxuries and near luxuries, and as small an amount as possible upon the necessities of life. In that respect I claim for this bill that it is almost ideally balanced. Almost exactly 50 per cent of the amount herein raised will be paid by accumulated wealth; about 30 per cent will be paid by luxuries, pure and simple; about 15 per cent will be paid by what might be called near luxuries; and very little more than 5 per cent will be paid by articles of absolute daily necessity.

I arrive at these conclusions in the following way: It is expected that something more than $850,000,000 will be raised by income and excess-profits taxes, something like $520,000,000 by taxes on luxuries, like spirits, wines, tobaccos, automobiles, musical instruments, jewelry, perfumery, amusements of various kinds, and by the customs duty on those things in the nature of luxuries which are imported into this country. It is expected that something like $320,000,000 will be derived from articles which might be called near luxuries or, at least, not things of absolute daily necessity, like passenger tickets, electric lights, telephone messages, business papers of various kinds, which we have always taxed in this country in time of war, and letters and periodicals.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. BROWNE. In what division would an automobile truck come? Would the gentleman consider that a luxury in any way?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Perhaps I would put an automobile truck in about the category that I would a freight bill. I think it comes fairly nearly being a necessity, but we are taxing freight bills. This is war.

Mr. BROWNE. But freight bills are not taxed 5 per cent on the gross amount.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; we tax them 3 per cent.

Mr. BROWNE. Why make the distinction between an automobile truck and a thrashing machine or any other kind of farm implements? Farm implements are manufactured by one of the greatest trusts in America, the International Harvester Co.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, if the gentleman will pardon me, I can not now undertake to split hairs. I think there is much to be said upon his proposition that an automobile truck is practically a necessity. But the people could get along without it in time of war.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; if the gentleman will make it a short question.

Mr. MEEKER. When the farmer has dispensed with his horses, when his stuff has gone to Europe in the war, how will he transport his goods without any automobile trucks?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, I do not think this provision will ever heavily affect the farmers of the gentleman's district. [Applause and laughter.] Now, the remaining $150,000,000 will come from one article I have just mentioned, tax on freight, which is a tax practically on necessities, and from the 10 per cent customs rate possibly one-half of which will consist of articles of daily necessity, but even so, gentlemen, just about 5 and not to exceed 6 per cent of all the taxes raised by this bill will come from articles of daily necessity.

To put the situation in another way, I think it can fairly be said that at least 95 per cent of all these taxes will be distributed among the very rich and among people of at least moderate means, and not more than 5 per cent among people of real needy circumstances. It seems to me, then, that, so far as the distribution of the burdens under this bill are concerned, it is almost ideally balanced, and that the bill can not be attacked upon that account.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does not the gentleman mean in reference to the 5 per cent, only 5 per cent will be put upon the wealthy and those in moderate or needy circumstances alike, instead of——

Mr. LONGWORTH. I said the 95 per cent would be distributed almost exclusively among the very rich and at least moderately well-off persons and not more than 5 per cent would be paid by people in really needy circumstances.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the gentleman has that too high, the 5 per cent would be shared.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I accept that amendment. I think that hardly any of these taxes will be paid by the poor people of the country.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. Does not the gentleman believe that the 95 per cent paid by those who are well to do will be in a large measure added to the cost of production and paid in the last analysis by the purchaser of the product?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I agree with the gentleman that almost all taxes are finally passed on the consumer, except probably a tax like the excess-profits tax or the income tax, which are the least susceptible of being passed along, and most of this money is raised by excess profits and income taxes. It is significant that protests against this bill come not from poor people, not from those whose necessities may cost more, but from the producers of luxuries whose tremendous profits in the past few years have caused a reorganization of American finance. Nine-tenths of the telegrams and letters of protest that have been pouring in upon us for the past few weeks, literally by the tons, come from the producers of luxuries pure and simple. Each one says we have singled him out to tax his industry with a discriminatory tax, and that it will bring ruin upon him. Is the tax imposed by this bill upon these luxuries unjust and discriminatory? We tax in exactly the same way, by a tax of 5 per cent upon their sales, automobiles, tires and tubes, musical instruments, phonograph records, motion-picture films, jewelry, sporting goods, pleasure boats, perfumes and cosmetics, proprietary medicines, and chewing gum. And in the same way we put a tax upon the amusement industry of this country. We put a tax of 10 per cent upon each ticket worth more than 10 cents for admission to baseball games, movie shows, theaters, and things of that sort. Literally thousands and tens of thousands of articles are taxed in precisely the same way in this bill. Is there anything unjust or discriminatory about that? If one of these taxes is right, then all of them are right. If one of them is wrong, then they are all wrong. If it is wrong or unjust to put a tax of 5 per cent for war purposes on the sale of automobiles, then it is wrong to put a similar tax on a piano, or a drum, or a movie film, or a diamond pin, or a bracelet, or a yacht, or a golf ball, or a tennis racket, or a bottle of cologne, or, I will say to my friend from Michigan who sits in front of me, a bottle of hair dye.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not on this hair-dye proposition. Or a ticket to a theater or a baseball game or a package of chewing gum to be consumed thereat. If one goes out, all ought to go out. But where would that leave us with our revenue bill. We would have destroyed revenue to the extent of $180,300,000. If taxes like these automobile taxes—like all of these tens of thousands of sales taxes—are wrong, then surely taxes even larger upon things like freight bills, express bills, passenger and Pullman tickets, telegrams and telephone messages, and the like are wrong.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman spoke a moment ago about taxes on moving-picture films. I notice, on page 26, this provision:

(d) Upon all positive moving-picture films (containing a picture ready for projection) sold or leased by the manufacturer, producer, or importer a tax equivalent to 1 cent per linear foot.

Now, how many feet of film on an average do they use in an evening's performance of a "movie" show?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I can not answer the gentleman accurately on that. We had very conflicting testimony. I should say possibly 5,000 or 6,000 feet.

Mr. MADDEN. More than 10,000 feet.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I beg the gentleman's pardon. They vary very greatly. Some of the larger films are as large as 20,000 feet.

Mr. KITCHIN. It was estimated that there were about between 350,000,000 and 400,000,000 feet bought and sold or leased in the United States during the year. Take a play like the Birth of a Nation and there are 12,500 feet in that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That would be $125 a night. Is that it?

Mr. KITCHIN. Half an hour's play, I imagine, would use about 3,000 feet. An hour's play would be perhaps 4,000 or 5,000 feet.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Many of these "movie" theaters are what are called a poor man's theater—a wonderful thing.

Mr. KITCHIN. I heard no poor man who kicked against this.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The poor man has not kicked.

Mr. KITCHIN. He has not kicked at all.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The average poor man is too busy earning his daily bread to learn of the legislation that is being proposed here. He does not know anything about it at all. Suppose there are 3,500 feet of film; that would be $35 for a single evening.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is mistaken. It does not say an evening performance, but it is the number of feet. It is the manufacturer, and the film is shown a hundred different times at different places, and not at one performance.

Mr. LONGWORTH. When the poor man comes before Congress to object to taxes on "movie" films, I am willing to listen to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] further.

Let me go on now. I am afraid I shall not have time to yield further at this moment. I was referring to these taxes on "movie" films, but I forgot to mention club dues, gentlemen. That is an unjust and discriminatory tax. That will ruin the clubs of this country, gentlemen. It will have a serious effect on the pockets of us clubmen. We ought to protest against such an unjust and discriminatory tax as that. But if taxes of this sort on luxuries are unjust, how much more unjust they are upon these other things I have mentioned, like freight bills, passenger tickets, telephone messages, telegrams, and things of that sort. Suppose we strike these from the bill—and we have much more justification in striking them out than we have the luxuries—what effect would that have on our revenue bill? That would lose us $222,250,000. Suppose we strike them all out, all these unjust and discriminatory taxes on sales, and where does that leave us? It leaves this bill lacking by more than $402,000,000 of raising the amount of money that is absolutely necessary. How do you, then, propose to finance this war, gentlemen?

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McCORMICK. I suggest that the gentleman is presenting an able defense of the more defensible provisions of the bill. Does he expect to discuss the retroactive income tax and the increase in the excess-profits tax?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say this to the gentleman from Illinois, that I do not expect to defend them as matters of public policy at all. I am absolutely opposed to the principle of the excess-profits tax. In fact, I was the Member on this side who offered the amendment to strike it out of the revenue bill known as the Kitchin bill. I believe, as a matter of public policy, that if we were to have an excess-profits tax in time of war it ought to be based on the same plan as the excess-profits tax in all the countries in Europe now at war; that is to say, a tax based upon the difference between war profits and peace profits. But, so far as I am concerned, I find myself now in this position: We have in this country the machinery for raising revenue of which I personally disapprove, but being more concerned now with raising money than with the perfecting of laws of which I disapprove I am willing to take this machinery and raise money with it. [Applause.] So far as the retroactive tax on incomes for 1916 is concerned, I am wholly and absolutely opposed to that scheme of raising revenue. I think it opens up a very dangerous field for taxation. But at least we were able in this bill to keep out the retroactive tax on excess profits which was suggested by the Treasury Department, and which was so much worse than this that when I was confronted finally with the absolute necessity of raising $110,000,000 in some way or other I was forced to accept this retroactive income-tax plan, much as I dislike it.

The Treasury Department estimates that the total receipts from all sources for the fiscal year 1917, now about to close, will be about $775,000,000, exclusive of postage receipts. This bill is designed to raise two and one-half times that. In other words, in one bill we are raising considerable more than twice the amount of revenue that ever flowed into the United States Treasury in any one year. At the time of the Civil War, with all the tremendous taxes of that day, the largest amount of money that ever came into the Treasury was $557,000,000. The largest amount that ever came into the Treasury during the Spanish War was $515,000,000. When I first came to Congress, gentlemen, 14 years ago, the total Treasury receipts were $587,000,000, and during all the time I have served here they have never run higher than $775,000,000, which were last year's receipts.

Mr. MANN. Exclusive of postage.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Exclusive of postage. Curiously enough, and I think this is a very remarkable fact, the receipts of the largest Civil War year, the receipts of the largest Spanish War year, and the receipts of the largest business year in history, when added together make a total of $1,830,000,000, or almost exactly the amount that is carried in this bill.

If I had been told a few years ago that I should some day be called upon to participate in the drafting of a revenue measure which would by itself raise as much as the entire revenues of the Government for its two largest war years and its largest business year combined, I would have cast reflection upon the prophetic ability of the person who so predicted. If some one had told me a few years ago that I would have ever joined with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] in agreement upon a revenue bill, I should have nominated that person as a fit candidate for an institution for the feeble-minded. And yet I find myself here in that position, and I am not ashamed of it under these circumstances. [Applause.]

If the postal receipts remain substantially where they were in 1916, the revenue this year under existing law would amount to $1,100,000,000; added to this $1,800,000,000, we will have a revenue next year of nearly $3,000,000,000—an amount so huge as to stagger the imagination; an amount as large as the total, including the post-office receipts, of the largest three years in the history of America.

Very nearly three-quarters of this sum will be provided by the five great revenue-producing sources of the country. We receive from customs duties about $430,000,000; from the excess profits tax, $425,000,000; from the income tax and the corporation tax, $975,000,000; from the tobacco tax about $170,000,000, and from the beer and spirit tax about $430,000,000.

I merely call these figures to your attention, gentlemen, to show what effect would be had upon the revenue by any amendment which would destroy any one of these sources of revenue to the Government.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield for a question at that point?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. FESS. I listened with a great deal of interest to the gentleman's analysis and especially to this last statement. The theory of the bill, as I take it, is to fix some of the tax upon the producer, so that he can not shift it to some one else, like the excess profits tax and the income tax. There has been a good deal of contention through the mails that the tax will destroy certain businesses, and one of those businesses is that of the automobile. Was the 5 per cent upon the manufacturer placed with the expectation that he would pay it, or that ultimately the user of the automobile would pay it?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say to my colleague that I do not think it conceivable, in the remotest degree conceivable, that the tax of 5 per cent on the sale of an automobile will be paid by anyone except the buyer of the automobile at retail. Now, gentlemen must remember that this tax is laid upon the manufacturer's or producer's sale price. We understand that the agents for automobiles receive anywhere from 20 to 30 per cent of the cost of the car. For instance——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman want some more time?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to have 20 minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield him 20 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 20 additional minutes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Take the ordinary automobile, a pretty good automobile, that sells for $2,000. That automobile is sold, as I understand it, to the agent for about $1,500. It is on the $1,500 that this tax is laid, so that in such a case the tax will be $75. I can not conceive how any man who can afford to pay $2,000 for a machine, assuming that this tax is entirely passed on, would balk at paying $2,075 for it. That is all there is to the proposition.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Realizing that my colleague has made a careful study of this question, is there any danger, in his opinion, that there is any business that is going to be ruined by this bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Absolutely not. Far from being ruined, I do not think they will be appreciably hurt. The automobile industry to-day taxes itself on every car that it makes something like 50 per cent. It taxes itself something like 20 per cent for advertising and something like 20 or 30 per cent for selling through agents, and the Government comes along and puts 5 per cent on. Is that going to ruin them? [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. In that connection, the tax being placed upon the selling price of the manufacturer or producer, will it be possible for the selling agent, increasing the price, to say that it is on account of the tax, without disclosing the difference between the selling price by the manufacturer and the selling price by the retailer or the agent?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, with the little experience I have had with automobile dealers, I know they will try to do it, but I do not think they will be able to put it over.

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman had said they would do it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I said that the purchaser would not know the exact amount that the agent would pay for the car.

Mr. MANN. He can not know very well, can he?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No.

Mr. MANN. I am not speaking merely of automobiles, but the tax upon all these products.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, on medicinal preparations——

Mr. LONGWORTH. It will be passed on.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether it will be passed on or not. The tax is paid by the manufacturer or producer. It is not the old stamp tax.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is right as to proprietary medicines that sell at a certain fixed price. With regard to almost all other articles, though, subject to this sale tax the tax, I think, will be passed on to the consumer.

Mr. MANN. They may add to the price, but I do not see how it is possible for the selling agent, retail or otherwise, to say, "The amount we added is the amount of the tax," because none of them want to disclose what he pays for the goods.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No doubt the gentleman is right with regard to some patent medicines, but they will still make a pretty good profit.

Of course, I weep for some of these men who are going to be ruined. The story that comes to us by the producer of that beneficent drink, "Coca Cola," brings tears to my eyes. He has made only $35,000,000 in the last few years, and a tax of 10 per cent is going to ruin him! How can you stand here and support such an unjust and discriminatory tax? [Laughter.]

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman, because he knows more of the automobile business than anybody.

Mr. DOREMUS. The gentleman spoke a moment ago of the manufacturer taxing himself 20 per cent for advertising. Will the gentleman be willing to give to the committee the source of that information?

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is my own judgment. I have no definite information.

Mr. DOREMUS. Do you know anything about it personally?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not know what they pay for advertising, but I do know that there is not a magazine or newspaper in this country that does not carry advertisements of automobiles, which are evidently more expensive than any other form of advertising.

Mr. DOREMUS. We will take that up a little later. But does the gentleman seriously contend that the manufacturer of an automobile selling at $2,000 spends $400 in advertising its sale?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would not say of my own personal knowledge that he does, but I think he would.

Mr. DOREMUS. Four hundred dollars to sell a $2,000 car?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think so. If the gentleman can show me that he does not, I will accept his statement.

Mr. DOREMUS. It is purely a guess?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; it is purely a guess. I will drop it to 10 per cent or 5 per cent if the gentleman can show me. Even so I think this tax justified.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In the theory of the bill is the tax to be paid when the automobile is manufactured or when it is sold?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Under the bill the seller or producer simply makes a return to the internal-revenue collector in his district, and it does not necessarily have to be paid at that particular moment. He is responsible for the tax. They would make a return of the cars manufactured and sold, under regulations imposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and I assume that the regulations would provide that the returns would indicate the number of sales and the taxes due.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. For one question.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman made a statement that no line of business would be ruined, and not only that but none would be appreciably hurt. We are receiving communications, scores of them in different lines of businesses, stating that the business will be ruined. Is that because they are trying to mislead us, or because they do not understand their business?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not think they have got it through their heads that we are at war.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield for one minute?

Mr. LONGWORTH. On Coca Cola? [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. No; we have the money to pay the tax and we are going to pay it. Will the gentleman give me some information as to how the committee arrived at a tax of 8 cents a pound on carbonic-acid gas?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I hope the gentleman will not ask me to explain that in detail.

Mr. HOWARD. The reason I ask is that I know the gentleman or the committee did not intend to do any injustice to any business.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No.

Mr. HOWARD. You want to be fair, and I have received a telegram from the manufacturers of the largest carbonic-acid gas plant in the country, and they run the M. P. Platt Laboratory. They have thousands of contracts on hand now for carbonic-acid gas at less than that a pound. It is taxed in the bill for 8 cents. They sell it at wholesale for 6 cents a pound. Can the gentleman give me any information as to how you arrived at the 8 cents a pound being a just tax when the manufacturer's wholesale price is less than the tax?

Mr. LONGWORTH. We had to guess to some extent. Gentlemen came before the committee and brought experts. There was a hearing on this subject. They differed as widely as the poles as to how much carbonic-acid gas was necessary to carbonize a certain amount. Some said 4 gallons and some said 20. I do not know whether the tax is absolutely right or not, but it is meant to catch soft drinks.

Mr. HOWARD. I am not discussing the tax on soft drinks. As far as that is concerned, I think you put a higher tax on soft drinks than you did on beer, but we will attend to that later.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, yes; the gentleman will be after the beer.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman will get the tax lower on beer before Congress adjourns. The thing that I am driving at is that I do not believe the committee intended to put a large concern wholly engaged in the manufacture of this product entirely out of business by putting a tax 2 cents higher than they get at wholesale.

Mr. LONGWORTH. My fundamental political belief is the industries of the United States ought to be encouraged. I am the last man that would vote knowingly for any proposition which I believe would result in the destruction of an American industry.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; and then I must proceed.

Mr. TOWNER. Is there in the bill any provision by which the Government will be protected with regard to the excess profits tax against the transfer of that which may legitimately be profits to the surplus?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The only amendment adopted in regard to the excess-property tax was one that we thought would make just a little clearer what invested capital consists of. I do not know whether it would be possible to prevent inaccuracies in reference to the piling up of a large surplus and thereby escape the tax. At any rate, we did not have an opportunity to go into that.

Mr. TOWNER. Will there be any amendment offered?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not think any amendment will come from the committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have given these figures to show that we are living in impressive times. Only a few weeks ago we authorized the issuance of more than $7,000,000,000 worth of bonds. When we pass this bill we shall have authorized the immediate raising from the national resources the staggering sum of $9,000,000,000, more than nine times the amount of our entire national debt.

This Congress will in a little more than a month have authorized the raising by bonds and taxation of an amount larger than any five Congresses ever did in 10 years. We have had to think to-day, we Members of the House of Representatives, in thousands where our predecessors thought in hundreds. We have to think in millions where they thought in tens of thousands. We have to think in billions where they thought in millions. Laboring as we are under such tremendous responsibilities, it is our added duty, as it seems to me, to approach these matters from the broadest possible point of view. The irresistible march of events has made us more than ever the representatives of the people of America rather than the representatives of the people of our constituencies. [Applause.] Representatives of the people of America rather than the representatives of our various political parties. It was in that spirit that the Ways and Means Committee undertook to frame this bill, and it is in that spirit that I sincerely hope this House will undertake the consideration of it.

I can say to you with perfect truth—and I indorse everything the chairman of the committee has said on that subject—that partisan lines were absolutely ignored in the framing of this bill, whether in subcommittee or in full committee. There have been great differences of opinion, it is true, but none of these differences have been based upon partisan lines. In every division Democrats have voted with Republicans and Republicans with Democrats; in no single instance did Democrats line up on one side and Republicans on another and Progressives on another.

My experience in helping to frame this bill convinces me more than ever that there can be no invariable rule in the imposition of taxes on a free people, except the one rule of fairness and reason. Years ago Chief Justice Marshall laid down the proposition that the power to tax is the power to destroy, and that question, so far as this country is concerned, is settled for good and all.

The very fact that power so gigantic is granted to Congress makes it all the more necessary that this power should be exercised with the most consummate discretion. We who are called upon to exercise these powers should always keep in mind the cardinal proposition that an unjust or unreasonable tax may defeat the very purpose for which the tax is laid. A tax which will cripple or destroy an industry or the earning power of capital or of an individual will to that extent at least destroy the revenue the tax is intended to produce. There is always a point where an addition to the tax burden means the impairment of revenue. I hope that that point is nowhere reached in this bill, though I fear that in some cases we may have come perilously near to it.

Upon one feature of the bill there was much discussion. Some well-meaning people have advocated the conscription of all incomes above $100,000 or even $50,000 a year. They point out that such a tax would raise considerably more than a billion dollars in the first year, but they neglect to point out how much it would raise in the second year or the third year. Such a policy, pushed to its logical conclusion, could have but one result, and that would be to make the Treasury bankrupt and to reduce the country to a condition of helplessness in the greatest emergency we have ever faced.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not the gentleman believe that the persons who are receiving these large incomes are sufficiently patriotic to be able to forego the use of the incomes until the termination of this war?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will answer that yes and no. Some would and some would not.

Mr. DOWELL. Then should not the Government compel them to be sufficiently patriotic to make contribution for the time the war continues?

Mr. LONGWORTH. We are calling upon them now to pay 50 per cent, and that is a pretty high tax. It is ten times higher than we are calling upon the people of small incomes to pay, and there is no possible way by which the Government can prevent a man who owns property from selling that property, there is no way in which you can prevent his buying Government bonds, and is that an unpatriotic thing to do in this crisis?

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman believe that these people receiving these large incomes will convert their property in such way that the Government can not receive proper tax from those incomes?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I believe that the tax that the gentleman apparently is advocating, though I do not believe he would vote for it—would the gentleman vote to conscript everything above $100,000 in incomes?

Mr. DOWELL. I would vote to conscript sufficient of the large incomes to very materially pay the price of this war. [Applause.] I think the people of the country would favor taking the incomes of all kinds rather than taking the chance of destroying the business of the country.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would the gentleman vote to conscript all incomes above $100,000 a year?

Mr. DOWELL. That is not the question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is my question.

Mr. DOWELL. I will go sufficient to raise a revenue——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further.

Mr. DOWELL. I will say to the gentleman that I will go sufficiently to raise the revenue——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further.

Mr. DOWELL. And if it takes it all I would favor that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course, the gentleman would not vote for confiscation; no sensible man would. Notwithstanding the fact that in some cases we may have pushed the taxes to the revenue-vanishing point, I am firmly convinced that this bill will raise not less than $1,800,000,000, and I believe a good deal more. While I believe and hope that it will raise nearly $2,000,000,000, I am frank to say this, that I think it would have been better on the whole if we had been satisfied with a more moderate sum. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to yield me 10 or 15 minutes longer.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes longer.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman answer one question not antagonistic?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, let me proceed.

Mr. SIMS. The question is not antagonistic. I want to ask the gentleman this, with his permission: If he does not believe that the sources of taxes, even to some extent to the amount of them here, are so just and reasonable that they will remain permanently in our taxation system after the war is over?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I certainly hope that we are not going to maintain this country upon the basis of preparation for a new war forever. I hope this is not going to last.

Mr. SIMS. I did not say that, but I said to some extent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. While the war lasts I am in favor of raising an amount necessary to adequately prosecute it. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. FESS. A mutual friend of ours from my own district, for whom the gentleman has a great deal of respect, has written stating that he thinks we have put the tax too high, and he said that the people do not know anything about it; that 90 per cent of the people do not yet know that we are in war. He thinks that there is danger that we will produce a countereffect in public opinion. I am wondering whether this bill will not have to be superseded by a second bill later on?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am going to come to that exact proposition. So far as 90 per cent of the country not knowing that we are at war is concerned, I will say to the gentleman that I think he and I and others did a good job last Saturday when we authorized the raising of four volunteer divisions to go abroad to show this country that we are really at war. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I said that I would be glad if we could have kept this bill down to a much more moderate figure than $1,800,000,000. I would have supplied more than we have by bonds and less by taxation.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. But I bow to the superior judgment of the Committee on Ways and Means in following literally the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. Just at this point, if it does not interrupt the gentleman, I desire to call his attention to the amendment adopted in the Senate on Saturday, by which we will lose approximately $430,000,000 of revenue.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am coming to that question. This bill is constructed upon the theory that one-half of the cost of financing the war should be borne by taxation on the present generation of the American people. To that theory—and I want it so distinctly understood—I do not subscribe. [Applause.] It is true that this administration in propounding this doctrine has limited the half-and-half principle to the remaining two months of the present and the next fiscal year. It is true also, as you read in the committee report, that we have subscribed to that principle to that extent alone. So far I am willing to go, but no further, in support of the half-and-half principle. I support the raising of $2,000,000,000 by taxation now only because I entertain the hope that this bill by its very hugeness will forestall the necessity of further taxation of the present generation for many years to come. I am firmly of the belief that in no country, particularly in a country whose population is rapidly increasing as it is here, that the present generation should ever be called upon to pay more than 25 per cent of the cost of war. No European country does it now. We have never done it before, and while I do not support the proposition that we should necessarily follow the example of Europe, nevertheless these are the facts. Great Britain is the only country now at war that has financed her war operations by increased taxation to the extent of as much as 25 per cent. In her case it is almost exactly 25 per cent. Since the beginning of the war France has paid only about 18 per cent of her expenses by taxation; Italy less; Germany not more than 10 or 11 per cent, and Russia practically nothing. I think it would be fair to say that less than 15 per cent of the cost of the European war is being borne by the present generation of the people of Europe. This proportion may be too small; I think it is too small; but certainly in a country where the population is increasing much more rapidly than any country in Europe it would be fair to assess the principal burden of the cost of war upon the generations to come. The present situation is simply this: It was estimated some time ago by the responsible officials of this Government that our war expenses alone for the next year will be something more than $3,800,000,000. We have already authorized an issue of $2,000,000,000 worth of bonds for that purpose, and we are here proposing to make up the balance by new methods of taxation. Gentlemen have criticized the Committee on Ways and Means for not filing a bill of particulars to show where every cent of this money is to go. Gentlemen seem to forget that this is war, and that it is not possible to estimate future Government expenses in war with the same accuracy as we can in time of peace. We state frankly that we do not know where all this money is going. We can not announce every detail of expenditure, but we do know this, that if this bill raises, as we estimate, at least $1,800,000,000, even if it runs to $2,000,000,000, that amount plus the $2,000,000,000 authorized by bonds will not meet the absolutely necessary expenses for the next year for war preparations alone.

Gentlemen, there are already filed in Congress estimates showing that it is necessary to raise for the Army $2,900,000,000 and for the Navy $500,000,000. For an emergency fund necessary to provide for some things that we can not even guess at now $100,000,000, and for war-risk insurance $50,000,000, and if you add to that half the amount estimated necessary for this new shipping program you arrive at the figure of $4,050,000,000. And that is not allowing for the full shipbuilding program that this administration evidently thinks necessary. I read from this morning's Washington Post:

BILLION SHIPPING PROGRAM STARTED—FEDERAL BOARD SIGNS ITS FIRST CONTRACT FOR STEEL VESSEL.

Signing of the first contract for ship construction under the administration's $1,000,000,000 building program was announced last night by the Federal Shipping Board. The contract went to the Los Angeles Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co., and called for delivery in 1918 of eight steel vessels, each to carry 8,800 tons of cargo.

It also was announced the board is bargaining for 250,000 tons additional steel and wood tonnage for delivery as early as possible. Some of the wooden ships already are under construction, their builders proceeding without awaiting formal contracts.

The Shipping Board plans to have built within the next 18 months at least 1,000 ships, steel and wood, of more than 3,000 aggregate tonnage, to combat the German submarine campaign. Bills to be introduced in Congress this week call for an initial appropriation of $400,000,000. Later, an additional $340,000,000 will be asked, and if this is not enough, still more will be sought.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield? Who gave them the authority for a $1,000,000,000 program?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes additional.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield there? Does the gentleman think it is a wise business policy to levy taxes in advance of schemes that have not yet been enacted into law?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think we have got to issue very soon $1,000,000,000 more bonds.

Mr. MADDEN. That is all right; but let us authorize it first.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman wants the same thing I do. I want to raise enough money now by taxation to prevent the taxation question from being again thrown open in the near future. Then the lid will be off; it is on now to a certain extent. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] just called my attention to an amendment recently adopted in the Senate which prohibits the use of grain in making distilled or fermented liquors. I pointed out a few moments ago that the revenue next year from distilled and fermented liquors will be $430,000,000. That will be lost except so far only as some distilled liquors now in bond are concerned should it become a law of this Congress. The point I am making is that we will not be safe under these circumstances to cut down this bill to any substantial extent.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Although I support it, I repeat that I am opposed to the principle upon which the bill is drafted, namely, that we should tax the present generation with 50 per cent of the cost of war.

Mr. MEEKER. Just a question for information. As a member of the committee, does the gentleman remember at any time any representative, or any other organization favoring prohibition, of the Anti-Saloon League or others, offering any substitute for raising that fund which will be lost?

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is one subject I have not heard discussed.

Mr. MEEKER. Not by them.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I regret I can not yield. This estimate leaves out all sorts of things that are going to be necessary for the building of Army posts and various kinds of equipment, and so forth. We would not be justified, gentlemen, inasmuch as we have only authorized the issue of $2,000,000,000 worth of bonds, in cutting off one cent, though I admit the principle is wrong, from this bill. If this were announced to be a permanent policy to be continued throughout the war, I would not support it, but I do it for the present and under existing circumstances for the reasons I have outlined.

Should this war in which we are engaged last for more than a year—and who in his heart doubts that it will?—we will be faced, we are even now faced, with the necessity for more money. Suppose that it were necessary to raise four billions? We could do it with bonds; and if we issued $4,000,000,000 worth of bonds, and should this tax measure stand where it is now, we would then have arrived at what I regard as the proper ratio between taxation and credit for war financing. We would then be raising 25 per cent of our war expenses by taxation of the present generation and 75 per cent by bonds to be paid by the generations to come.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I wish the gentleman would let me get through.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. A short question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. All right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If it is equitable to raise 25 per cent, or, better still, raise 50 per cent, is it not better to have the whole country pay the 25 per cent or 50 per cent than to make the Pacific Coast States pay more than their share?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will not answer that question. I decline to join in any sectional argument upon this bill. I think every part of the country ought to stand its share. [Applause.] Thirty or forty years from now our population will at least have doubled. When the bonds we are now issuing become due it may be that there will probably be more than 250,000,000 people in this country. Is it not fair to ask them to pay approximately three-fourths of the cost of a war fought by the people of to-day that their heritage may be secured? We are facing great responsibilities, my colleagues of the House, responsibilities greater than any of us ever have or probably ever will be called upon to assume. We are at war by our deliberate action with the greatest military power of all time. We are about to impose a tax burden of tremendous proportions upon the American people, one which will affect to a more or less extent every man, woman, and child in our constituencies. Let us not delude ourselves into the belief that any of these taxes will be popular. No tax is ever popular with the person who pays it, and these taxes will affect millions. Let us in voting on this measure discard all thought of how our votes may affect us politically. Let us make the measure of any tax we are about to impose not its popularity but its essential justice.

I am confident that no patriotic American in times like these will balk at the payment of any tax imposed by the national defense if only he is convinced that it is just. Let justice be the one test in every tax we are about to impose, whether the man it burdens be high or low, or rich or poor. And thus, gentlemen, we will have done our duty not only to our constituencies but to our country. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN.] [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it has been a very great delight to see the unanimity existing between the Democrats and the Republicans on the Ways and Means Committee and to hear the laudatory statements that have been made by each side as to the other. It seems more like a mutual admiration society than it does like anything else, and I am glad to see this era of good feeling in a time of war. When the world is ablaze with trouble it is a good thing that we have peace at least in the House of Representatives. Everybody in America who claims to be an American is just as loyal to the flag as the members of the Ways and Means Committee. And all men in American life who helped in the development of our industrial system are just as anxious for the success of the war as anybody in the administration can be. Everybody wants to meet the obligations that the war imposes to the extent that these obligations may be necessary and are just.

But I apprehend that no man, no matter how anxious he may be for success, wants to have imposed upon him undue burdens from which other people are relieved.

We have entered upon a gigantic enterprise, and we all realize that it is going to take a lot of money and it is going to take more than money, for it will take blood and patriotism. I think before we are through every home in America, if they do not already know it, will realize that we are at war. I do not want them to become so full of the realization of war that sorrow will take the place of happiness everywhere, but I do want the American people to understand that we are engaged on a project from which there is now no turning. At the same time, I want them to understand that we are going to deal justly with them, not only on the business side but every other side, for we all must realize, and they must realize, that incomes do not fall down from the sky. If you have incomes that you can tax you must have business from which to attain that income, and if you destroy the business you have destroyed the opportunity of the American people to finance the war, and without finance we are not going to succeed.

I am as anxious to be considered patriotic as any man, and I have endeavored by my actions to prove my patriotism. And while I think there ought not to be any politics in the consideration of the questions involved in the war, yet I think it would be very bad for the country if everybody was to reach the conclusion that no criticism of the plan or measures presented for the conduct of the war would be permissible. I think the healthiest thing that can happen to the administration, to those who have the responsibility of conducting this war, is to have a few men somewhere in public life with the courage to criticize. The mere fact that a man criticizes is no evidence that he is less patriotic than the man that follows the lead of somebody else without consideration. I think it is more patriotic, and if not more equally as patriotic, to have men with courage to-day willing to criticize the acts of the administration and to point out the pitfalls and the dangers of extravagance, as it is for men to follow blindly in whatever the administration wants them to do.

Now, I want to support the Commander in Chief of the American Army loyally, and I will support him loyally to the extent that he has the right to be supported, more loyally than the men of his own political faith have done; but I reserve the right, not as a Republican, not as a Democrat, but as an American, to criticize whatever he proposes or what any other man connected with the administration proposes. And I do not do that because it comes from a Democratic administration. I do that because I believe it conserves the rights of the American people.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Why is it you deny other people the same privilege you claim for yourself?

Mr. MADDEN. When did I do that?

Mr. GORDON. You are just priding yourself on the fact that you supported the President better than some of the Democrats.

Mr. MADDEN. I say that is true, and I can prove it.

Mr. GORDON. Do you question the honesty and the motives of those who have not been supporting him? If so, there is no force in your argument.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not making an argument. I am stating a fact. If I was making an argument, there might be room for discussion; but I am only making a statement of fact, and it needs no discussion.

Now, I propose to point out if I can, not by any figures that I have made but by the figures made by the Ways and Means Committee on this bill to tax the American people $1,800,000,000, that it is $691,000,000 more than is shown to be needed by any computations or any estimates made by anybody in authority.

I will take the last report of the Ways and Means Committee, made during the consideration of the last revenue bill. In that report it was shown by the Ways and Means Committee that the total estimated disbursements for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, would be $1,368,445,910. Then they estimated the revenue from various sources, which I will enumerate in the RECORD, as $1,001,750,000. They estimated excess disbursements from receipts of $366,695,910. Then they deducted the estimated balance in the general fund, $64,305,931, and it left a deficit of $302,389,939. And then for a necessary working balance in the Treasury they add another $100,000,000, leaving $402,389,939 to raise by taxation. And later on the Ways and Means Committee report bond issues to meet the expenditures incident to the Mexican situation, $162,418,000; for the construction of the Alaskan Railway, $35,000,000; armor-plate plant, $11,000,000; for purchase of the Danish West India Islands, $25,000,000; or $233,418,000; and the bonds already authorized for the shipping act, $50,000,000; nitrate plant, $20,000,000. Add that to the other, and it makes $303,418,000. And then there were the Panama Canal bonds, which can be issued at any time, $222,000,000. That made necessary an additional bond authorization of $81,418,000.

Now, then, to recapitulate, the Ways and Means Committee in its report, No. 1366, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, dated January 29, 1917, said:

> The estimated amount necessary to raise by bond issues is $402,318,939.

Bonds were issued to reimburse the Treasury for expenditures incident to Mexico, and the other ones which I have already enumerated, amounting to $195,256,292, still leaving $207,133,647 to be raised. Then they raise this amount: Estimated additional receipts under the proposed bill, excess-profit tax, $236,000,000, estate tax, $22,248,000, against $207,133,647, leaving a surplus on excess of bond issues of $41,000,000 over the then needs of the Government. And that, mind you, was to meet the obligations of the Government to June 30, 1918.

Now, the Ways and Means Committee comes in and it makes this report——

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Not until I get these figures in. I think they ought to go in consecutive order. This is report No. 45, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, May 9, 1917. The war expenditures for the remainder of this fiscal year and the whole of the next fiscal year are estimated to be $3,800,000,000, exclusive of the $3,000,000,000 bond issues to finance the foreign loans. "We have already authorized a bond issue of $2,000,000,000"—I am using the words of the Ways and Means Committee now—"to provide a portion of the necessary funds to finance the war. Therefore the amount necessary to be raised by taxation or a further bond issue at this time is $1,800,000,000."

Now, mind you, they already have $41,000,000 of an excess to begin the year with, to begin the war with, if you please, and they say that the war expenses will amount, according to the estimates on hand, to $5,800,000,000; and that they have authorized a $2,000,000,000 bond issue to meet part of this, leaving the amount of the present bill to be raised by taxation.

Now, let us see what it says. According to the estimates of the various departments which have been met by appropriations, we need $1,108,618,000. That is what the department says. That is what I say. That is what the Appropriations Committee has said. That is what everybody who has talked has said, except the Committee on Ways and Means.

Now, the appropriations that we have made to meet the obligations which the Committee on Ways and Means says we have to meet are as follows: We have met the obligations of a general deficiency authorization of $100,000,000. That was to be given to the President to be used as he wanted to use it. Then we have authorized a deficiency bill of $68,000,000, and then we have authorized the expenditure of $7,000,000 for the cost of marketing the bonds that we authorized to be issued, and we have passed a deficiency bill amounting to $2,700,000,000 to maintain the Army for the next year to June 30, 1918.

The Appropriations Committee said they had made a thorough investigation of the needs of the Army and the Navy at that time. The Committee on Military Affairs wanted to appropriate $3,000,000,000. The House struck it out, and the House on further consideration said by its action that we needed only $2,700,000,000, and that was appropriated; and that involved the expenditures of the United States to maintain the Army, to raise it, to pay for a million new men for eight months; to raise the new army, to equip it, to maintain it, to put it in the field and furnish its equipment of all kinds, ammunition, powder, guns, and cannon. It provided for the maintenance of the Navy. It provided for the increase of the personnel of the Navy, and for all of the things that go to make up a successful war, as they said. That is $2,700,000,000 added to the figures I have mentioned previously, which make $2,807,- 068,000. Then deduct from that the $2,000,000,000 of bonds you have authorized. What have you left? $807,068,000.

Then we have contracts authorized that are required to be paid before July 1, 1918, amounting to $56,000,000, and we add that to the $807,068,000 and you have $863,618,000. Then I have allowed the interest on the $7,000,000,000 that we have authorized for the whole year, amounting to $245,000,000, and everybody knows that these bonds are not going to be on the market for a whole year, and that you will not have to pay more than one-half of the $245,000,000 interest during the coming year. But with the allowance of the $245,000,000 for interest on the $7,000,000,000 of bonds that have been authorized, all of the obligations, according to the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Ways and Means itself, made by their reports and their appropriations and recommendations, and the failure of the department to make any estimate of further obligation, leaves the country obligated only to the extent of $1,108,618,000, to raise which you are taxing the people of the United States $1,800,000,000.

Now, I apprehend that the policy of taxation is to raise revenue to meet obligations, not to create obligations and to create extravagance in the departments that will allow them to run wild and without reason in the expenditure of money that has not been authorized.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. None of this money can be expended, can it, without the Committee on Appropriations authorizing it?

Mr. MADDEN. I am not in favor of putting it in the Treasury and taking it out of the pockets of the people of the United States and out of the business of the United States and putting it into the Treasury of the United States, at the disposition of the Secretary of the Treasury or any other man that ever lived. [Applause.] Why should you? We need the money in the business of the country. We need to maintain the prosperity of the country. We need to maintain our power to finance the war, and you can not finance the war by putting men into bankruptcy, by taking money out of the pockets of the people, money that the Government does not need. I am willing to admit that we are going to need a lot of money, and I am willing to vote for all the money that we need when we need it, but not a year in advance of when we need it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Do you include in your estimate the $500,000,000 to be used in the construction of merchant ships during the next fiscal year?

Mr. MADDEN. Has anybody authorized that?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; but it is coming. We need that as well as any other expenditure of the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. When it comes, let us meet it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is going to come within the next 30 days.

Mr. MADDEN. We ought not to levy taxes on the people for money that nobody knows anything about, not even the lawmaking power. [Applause.] I am basing my talk upon the facts; not on somebody's supposition. I am basing my talk on facts as they exist to-day, and not what would exist 10 years from to-day. But I am ready to meet and join any Member of this House or any other citizen of the United States in an effort to meet any obligation of the Government when the obligation comes. But why take this money out of the pockets of the American people by levying an unjust tax in order that you may have money to go on indiscriminately, without authority of law, to do things that ought not to be done, frequently?

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. Is not the real question, after all, what proportion of the expense should be met by taxation, and if it should be 50 per cent, it is not material how long a bond issue has been authorized?

Mr. MADDEN. The question is, What are we levying a tax for? Is it for the obligations already created and authorized? That is the point I am making. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin believe that we ought to levy taxes of $691,000,000 for something that is being anticipated?

Mr. LENROOT. No; but if the gentleman will yield, my idea is that if we ought to pay one-half of the expenses of the war by taxation that then the bond issue should be that much less.

Mr. MADDEN. That is true, because the bond issue would be in proportion to the figures I have made, which show that we have already estimated $691,000,000 more than they ought to have estimated as taxation. Then, of course, the bond issue ought to be reduced in that proportion.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. LANGLEY. Does not the gentleman think that more of the expense of this war should be borne by future generations?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, that is a question of policy that ought to be considered as to how much of the present cost of the war should be paid by taxation and how much by future taxation. But now I want to revert a little to this fact. It has been said that we are levying a gross tax of 5 per cent on the sales of automobiles and that this gross tax will be no burden upon the industry. It has been stated frequently that if the man against whom the tax is levied does not make any money, he will not have to pay any tax; but you may put him in a position where he can neither pay the tax nor make any money, and then he will be worse than a liability, and he certainly will not be an asset to the Government.

This 5 per cent gross-sale tax is the most unjust tax that has ever been proposed by any governing body in all the world. England started to levy an excess-profits tax, and then made up her mind later on that it was the wrong thing to do. The gross-sale tax of 5 per cent amounts to 25 per cent on a man's net profits. Did anybody ever stop to think what 5 per cent gross tax means and what it amounts to? Then you do not propose to let him charge it as a part of the expense. If he did that, it would not be so unjust, but he will not be allowed to charge it as a part of the cost of the machines against which he pays the tax. Oh, no; he can not pass it on. The men in the automobile business in the United States—and there are only about 450 of them—are nearly all on the ragged edge. [Laughter.]

Oh, you can laugh all you want to, but it simply shows that you do not know what the facts are. There are only 8 or 10 manufacturing automobile concerns that are making any money. The rest of them are either ready to go into bankruptcy or waiting to get the rest of the money that their friends are willing to loan them before they go out of business. That is the truth about it.

A MEMBER. What about Ford?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, everybody thinks about a Ford when you speak about an automobile, because Ford has made a lot of money, but he is only one of a few. They are not going to be able to pass this on; they are not going to be able to charge it as a part of the expense. When they get through paying the tax they will be in bankruptcy and your excess-profit tax, and personal income tax, and corporation tax, and all that, will find itself where it can not produce any money.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman contends that the automobile companies will not be able to pass on the tax?

Mr. MADDEN. I do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman contend the same thing is true in regard to musical instruments?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely, there may be occasionally a cheap one that can do it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would the gentleman vote against it?

Mr. MADDEN. I will vote against it, and I am going to vote against the bill, if it is not eliminated.

Mr. MANN. And there are others.

Mr. MADDEN. We have a $7,000,000 tax on advertising. You tax the billboards. The real advertising you have not touched at all. You put a 5 per cent tax on them and you say they can pass it on. How do you know whether they can pass it on or not? A lot of these people have contracts, contracts that have been in existence anywhere from a year to 5 years, and they run from 1 year to 10 years. The price is fixed and you can not pass it on. The legitimate way would be to levy small tax on all advertising and make it uniform. Why should a newspaper or a magazine, all these publications that have influence enough to tell you whether you are all right, tell the people whether your name is a good name or a bad name, and whether you have been doing your work right here or not, be exempt. Why should the billboards and the street car advertisements pay it all. Why should it be confined to eight or ten thousand people engaged in trying to make an honest living and all the influential magazines and newspapers escape? The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee said to me the other day that, as a member of the Post Office Committee, I did not have the courage to levy a tax on the magazines for carrying them across the country, and now it is evident that he and his associates were in the same fix that he said the Post Office Committee was in. I am not in favor of making the increase in postage in the first or second class mail, according to the figures that this committee has made. I believe that if you put this item into this bill, as you have made it on the zone system, you will drive every trade journal of the United States out of business. You will sectionalize the thought of the American people. You will prevent the interchange of thought of the East with the thought of the West, and you will do more damage by failing to give an opportunity for the free interchange of thought between the sections of the country than you will reap benefit in imposing the tax.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. One or two points which the gentleman has made interest me. I would like to know whether the gentleman intends to suggest a method by which the $1,800,000,000 can be raised.

Mr. MADDEN. You do not need it all; that is the answer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman's statement varies from that of the Treasury Department and the President of the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the President of the United States has made any statement as to the amount.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to agree with the gentleman on several of his propositions, but we are up against the question of raising $1,800,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. The question the gentleman is up against is a question that does not comport with the facts. It seems to me that what we ought to be dealing in are facts, not fancies.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We have already provided for an issue of $2,000,000,000 of bonds.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and I am giving you credit for that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And we are providing for a total expenditure of $3,800,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; that is, you are.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That leaves $1,800,000,000 that must be raised by taxation.

Mr. MADDEN. That is only in the imagination of the Ways and Means Committee. I have given you the figures from your own report that show you need only $1,108,618,000, and I did not make those figures. You made them, and the Committee on Appropriations makes them, and I am just tabulating them. I am acting as an amanuensis for your committee.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman agree to the proposition that the expenses for the next fiscal year should be borne 50 per cent by taxation and 50 per cent by bonds?

Mr. MADDEN. I would be perfectly willing to do that.

Mr. GARNER. Then, may I ask the gentleman, according to the gentleman's statement——

Mr. MADDEN. Then we would reduce this cash expenditure $300,000,000 and reduce the bonds by $300,000,000.

Mr. GARNER. According to the gentleman's statement, it is necessary to levy at least $1,600,000,000 in order to take care of it.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; it would be, if you take credit for the bonds.

Mr. GARNER. For a fifty-fifty proposition it will be at least $1,600,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. But if you are going to utilize all of the bond issue it would not be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have 10 minutes more.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. GARNER. And if you take $1,600,000,000 as being 50 per cent for taxation, and then deduct from that the revenue for distilled spirits, amounting to over $430,000,000, I would like to have the gentleman tell me how you are going to get the money?

Mr. MADDEN. Then, you have $200,000,000 of bonds to pay on that, $200,000,000 of bonds preserved here by permitting the bond issue to be only partially used, and you get all the money you need, but it would not be lost, because the whisky now in bond would pay the tax next year when released regardless of what may be done with respect to the use of grain in the manufacture of alcoholic liquors.

I am opposed to this retroactive income tax of $108,000,000. I do not see any reason why we should go back a year from the 1st of January, 1917, to levy a tax on people who have already been taxed and who have paid their tax. It is not right, there is no justice in it, and when we can not raise revenue and go back for a year and a half there is something wrong with the system. If we can go back for a year and a half, we can go back to the beginning of the Government and take everything that everybody has—and that is about what you are doing here.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is familiar with this whole subject. What about the custom of other countries on that question of the retroactive tax?

Mr. MADDEN. England is levying only 25 per cent tax upon her people for the conduct of the war, and she is issuing securities for 75 per cent. France is levying 18 per cent taxes and issuing securities for the rest, and I understand that Germany is issuing 13 per cent taxes and issuing securities for the rest, and she is getting along fairly successfully so far as I have been able to ascertain.

Mr. HILL. And on the policy which they are pursuing they have gone broke, and we have had to lend them for the rest of the war.

Mr. MADDEN. We are not lending Germany anything, are we?

Mr. HILL. Certainly. Yes; we did.

Mr. MADDEN. When did we lend Germany anything?

Mr. HILL. Two years ago.

Mr. MADDEN. When and what?

Mr. HILL. Bonds sold right here in the United States before our declaration of war.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman means Germany?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. That is all right. We as a Government did not lend it. The people of the United States who had money to invest thought it was proper to buy any security that was offered to them and recommended by the bankers, and the board of control of the Federal Bank System told our bankers not to lend anybody any money and the next week or two told them to lend everybody money. [Laughter.] We have now issued $7,000,000,000 of bonds, and $3,000,000,000 of those are being loaned upon the recommendation of the Federal Reserve Board. There is another thing that I want you gentlemen to understand, to think about, and you better take it home with you and consider it. Do you know that you have created more disturbance in the minds of the business people of the United States by this bill than has ever been created in the business mind of this country in the history of my experience? Do you know that more people are ready to go into bankruptcy than you have any thought of? If you do not give some reasonable consideration to the questions that involve the integrity of the business of the United States you will not be able to finance this war. We ought to finance the war without any trouble, but we are already having trouble financing the bonds that we have placed on the market, and I see by the morning papers that the Secretary of the Treasury is going to engage all of the orators that were out in the last campaign to go out and educate the American people into the idea that they ought to buy American bonds—liberty bonds. I suppose all you spellbinders on that side who were out in the last campaign will be called upon to speak.

Mr. MANN. I suppose he will get all of the orators who said that the President had kept us out of war.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I mean—men who were out in the last campaign.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. Before the gentleman gets away from the second-class mail matter, I would like to ask his opinion as to a statement made to me in a letter by the president of an important publishing company in central Pennsylvania, in which he says that his company now pays the Government $40,000 a year, and that with the imposition of the proposed tax it would have to pay $140,000 a year, and that the minute that is put into operation they go out of busness.

Mr. MADDEN. Then he would not have to pay anything.

Mr. FOCHT. That would be a process of elimination, if not confiscation, and nothing whatever for the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. That would be extermination with a vengeance?

Mr. FOCHT. What shall I wire that gentleman?

Mr. MADDEN. Tell him that the Committee on Ways and Means is inexorable and that it is altogether likely the majority of the House will stand for this bill, although there are a few who have the courage to think they will vote against it.

Mr. FOCHT. There is no possibility of passing this tax along?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. FOCHT. Well, in two minutes I will have your message on the wire to my friend in Pennsylvania.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman has been a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads for years?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And I regard his opinion very highly. Does the gentleman think that second-class mail matter pays as high a rate as it should, whether it is on a zone rate or a flat rate?

Mr. MADDEN. What I would do if I had my way about it, but I have never had it, would be that I would double the rate and make it a flat rate of 2 cents, and not under any circumstances make it a zone rate [applause], because you can not transport this educational matter on a zone basis. When you get to a zone basis or a point where they have to pay 8 cents a pound for the transportation they are out of business. Now take the Christian Science Monitor. That is one of the best papers in the United States—a clean, daily paper, it is true, but it gives the news, foreign and domestic. It does not have anything in it that is not clean and it goes all over the United States. It can not go all over the United States if the zone rates go into effect. Then the trade journals of the United States are essential to the development of the trade industries of the United States and are essential for the information of the people engaged in various lines of trade in order that they may be advised of what is going and what contracts are being let. Their news is up to date and they go all over the United States, and they can not do it if the zone-rate system goes into effect.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I know the gentleman has given this thorough and careful study, being a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Will the gentleman give the committee an idea of what additional revenue will be raised if this was put on a flat 2-cent rate?

Mr. MADDEN. It would raise double the revenue. We now raise $11,000,000 and that would make about $22,000,000, and it would not be a hardship on anybody. I believe it would have gone into effect some time ago but for the fact that paper was so high and the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads believed it would not be wise on account of the high price of paper to put it into effect just at this time. This does not raise any more money than we would on a flat-rate basis because it will put everybody out of business.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I do.

Mr. SWITZER. The gentleman believes the Post Office Department can provide the machinery for separating what is called the commercial part from the advertising——

Mr. MADDEN. It is no trouble, it is the simplest thing in the world.

Mr. SWITZER. Why not put that on the increased rate and let the other alone.

Mr. MADDEN. That is the thing we have been talking about and discussing and considering and studying and we find we could do it very readily and we practically reached an agreement by which the Postmaster General and the Post Office Committee and people who are engaged in the publishing business could come to a solution of the question that would be satisfactory to everybody involved including the Government. It was not put into effect because we are waiting for a lower price of paper.

Mr. HELVERING. Did not that contemplate the zone system?

Mr. MADDEN. No; that is an amendment to the Post Office bill, but that is not what we considered. That came out of the committee but nobody voted for it except the man who put it in.

Mr. HELVERING. I understood there was a zone-rate system on the commercial part.

Mr. MEEKER. Can the gentleman give the committee any information as to why a thing of such tremendous importance, which evidently belongs to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, gets on a revenue bill?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I suppose the Committee on Ways and Means wanted to raise revenue and they saw a chance to raise it and they thought it was a wise thing to do and they were running along the lines of least resistance, I am quite sure.

Mr. MEEKER. As a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads can the gentleman say whether that committee ever advised——

Mr. MADDEN. Not so far as I know—maybe with the chairman of the committee, but nobody else.

Mr. GARNER. May I state for the benefit of the gentleman from Missouri that the matter was referred to the Post Office Committee, and they considered it and sent word back to the Committee on Ways and Means, "Have your way about it; we will be satisfied"——

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say the Post Office Committee considered it?

Mr. MADDEN. I was not at such a meeting——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said the committee considered it.

Mr. MADDEN. I think there was a meeting which I did not attend; I did not receive any notice.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will allow——

Mr. MADDEN. Let me answer. They said, I think, that they were perfectly willing to have the Ways and Means Committee consider it.

Mr. GARNER. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. PAIGE. As a matter of fact the Post Office Committee considered it to this extent, that they would waive jurisdiction of the matter, and that the Committee on Ways and Means could consider it.

Mr. MEEKER. Did not the gentleman from California, a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads say——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, I want to say in conclusion, that the excess-profits tax is what I think to be a very unscientific tax. It is a very unjust tax; it is a tax that ought not to be imposed, because an excess-profits tax works unequally between two men with the same amount of capital.

For example, I might engage in a business with $100,000 capital to-day, and any other gentleman here might do the same thing, and we might go on building up our business for 25 years. I would run my business along scientific, systematic, business lines and would charge off all the depreciation in my plant every year, and at the end of 25 years my capital would remain about the same that it was when I started, but my profits would be larger on the capital. I would have had an established, successful business. Some other man might start in, as I said, with the same capital and run a slipshod business and every engine that he purchased, whether it was worn out or not, after it had been used for a while, he would still continue to carry as an asset at the original cost.

If he put up a building, he would not charge anything for depreciation against the building. And at the end of 25 years he might have accumulated $900,000 of assets of that sort. They would not be worth much, but they would be added to his capital. And so the man here who ran his business along scientific lines, charging off for depreciation and everything which ought to be charged off every year, would find himself at the beginning of this tax system with his original capital. He would make as much money on his original capital as the other man on his accumulated capital. So his profits would seem large. So if he had $100,000 capital he would be allowed to collect 8 per cent on it after deducting $5,000. And the other man, having allowed all his old junk to accumulate, would have $1,000,000 of capital and surplus, and he would be allowed to collect 8 per cent on that before the Government could begin to take its share. So the one man with equal capital, running his business in a slipshod way, having everything charged up to surplus that he found himself in possession of, would be able to collect 8 per cent on a million dollars, and the other man, who had been scientific in the conduct of his business, would be able to collect 8 per cent on $100,000, and the Government would come along to the $100,000 man and collect 8 per cent on what he had left. So you see what an injustice it is to the Government and to the man who has been systematic and honest in the conduct of his business.

You say the Government of the United States, through its experts, will say what the surplus is to be. This surplus was not created with a view of fooling the Government of the United States. It was created at a time when the Government of the United States had no right to recognition in connection with the case. The excess profits tax is collected on the basis of one million against one man and on the basis of $100,000 against another man, men who are doing business on equal terms, one man having been systematic and honest and fair and the other man endeavoring to pile up a surplus that he calls capital. But the way to do that thing, if you want to be just, is to levy a net profits tax. Now, this excess profits tax should be levied equally against everybody. Why did not the Committee on Ways and Means stop and consider the question along scientific business lines? Why did they not stop and consider what was the most just and equitable? Why did they stand by this excess profits tax, where there is no equality of opportunity for the collection of the tax on equal terms, and where one man is allowed favoritism and the other man is discriminated against?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Can the gentleman tell the committee how he would estimate the net profits in any different way?

Mr. MADDEN. I would estimate the net profits of a concern on the basis of what it cost to conduct the concern. I would give them credit for all the dollars they received and would compel them to charge every dollar that they used in the conduct of their business, and when they got through doing that, what would be left would be net profits, without respect to what the capital was.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What would you estimate the net profits on?

Mr. MADDEN. I would estimate it on the basis of earnings and legitimate expenses without respect to capital.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No matter what it was?

Mr. MADDEN. Any legitimate expense incurred in the conduct of his business. I would not let him estimate it on old junk, and worn-out engines, and boilers that had been in existence for 50 years and were falling into decay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I am very much obliged for the consideration you have shown me. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I shall be able physically to continue for 15 minutes. I did not intend to speak at this time, but some statements have just been made that induced me to suggest to the gentleman in charge of the time that I should like to reply to them now. They are so directly contrary not only to the facts but to the character of the gentleman who made them that it seems to me they ought to be refuted. Only two or three weeks ago the same gentleman made these remarks on the floor of the House:

> There is no way to win this war except by men and money. * * * I would not care whether we were repaid for the bonds or not. * * * We ought to begin the war upon which we have entered now; to-day; not to-morrow.

That does not mean to postpone until next December appropriations for the equipment of men who are going into the field within 60 days. I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to his own statement again.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Why, of course, I made that statement then, and I make it now.

Mr. HILL. You have not done so. You said, "We ought to begin the war upon which we have entered now; to-day; not to-morrow."

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Why, what the gentleman suggests is no argument against what I have said on the floor at all.

Mr. HILL. Not at all. It is an entirely different matter. The gentleman says now that if taxes he does not approve of are included in this bill he will not vote for it. How are you going to pay your soldiers or buy your ammunition? Is this bill to be made to suit your particular views or else the Nation withdraw from the war with Germany?

Mr. MADDEN. Just a moment. Do not get excited. What I have said, and the gentleman is not fair in making the statement that he does, is that according to your statement, the statement of the Ways and Means Committee, you want only $1,180,000,000.

Mr. HILL. I will take that up in a minute. Do not take my time for that. I do not think that I ought to yield to the gentleman any longer, and I will tell him why.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want you to.

Mr. HILL. Because two weeks ago he used this language:

> The American people believe that the time for talk has passed, that the time for action has come, and, for God's sake, let us get into action.

Now he wants me to yield to him to discuss the merits of an automobile tax.

Mr. MADDEN. That was on the war bill that I was talking.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Certainly I yield.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that my colleague is to be criticized——

Mr. HILL. No; I will say that in advance.

Mr. MANN. Let me ask my question—criticized for saying a word not in approval of this bill, after the members of the committee had talked for four days, wasting the time of the House from the gentleman's standpoint, supporting the bill instead of voting on it?

Mr. HILL. I do not. I think the gentleman's criticism is fair, and for that reason I surrendered my time, which was given to me a few days ago, so that we could sooner get into the five-minute debate. But the gentleman's statement was so misleading that I thought I ought to ask a little time to set the House right on the question.

I am going to tell the Members of the House, if they will pardon me for a few minutes, just what my connection is with this bill. I am a business man, like the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. I like to do business, whether it is war or peace, on business principles; and the day before the Committee on Ways and Means met at all I went to the Committee on Appropriations and got the estimates which the Committee on Ways and Means was called upon to provide for. There they are—the printed estimates sent by the department to the Committee on Appropriations. There is the tabulation and the footing which the clerk to the Committee on Appropriations gave me. They amounted to $3,556,196,784.37. I took that and went to the Treasury Department. I said to the Secretary of the Treasury, "We meet to-morrow, and we have got to raise this money." I do not think I am violating any confidence in stating the substance of this conversation in a great national crisis of this kind, and if anybody thinks I am, let him stop me now. I said to the Secretary, "Have you included in your estimates the interest on the bonds?" I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who has just stated that in his judgment it ought to be included; the interest on the bonds, all the bonds, what we loan to the allies as well as our own. We have practically entered on a program, gentlemen, of financing the allies at the rate of $400,000,000 a month. I think that is conceded. We will have exhausted the authorized bonds by January. There are 14 months of the life of this bill—May and June and 12 months of the fiscal year 1918. At $400,000,000 a month we will need to issue $5,600,000,000 of bonds and we have only authorized $3,000,000,000.

I said to the Secretary, "I think we ought to include in this estimate all of the interest on the three billions already authorized." You know as well as I that some of the very money which we are loaning them now must be taken by them to pay the interest on the bonds they have already out, and we can not expect to get the interest on these bonds back from those people now. There is not the slightest doubt that so far as this generation is concerned the bond issues are practically an annual expense to us in the conduct of this war. We will get them paid by and by in years to come, but we have got to carry these people along. As any of you know, if you take a man in hard circumstances and indorse half his paper you guarantee the other half by so doing, or else lose your own. That is the position we are in with reference to these nations with whom we are allied. We can not say to the people who buy our bonds, "France or England have not paid their interest." The American people have got to pay it the day it is due, whether anybody else pays it or not, and any good business man would do that.

How much does it amount to? One hundred and ninety-two millions five hundred thousand dollars on the bonds, and that does not include six months' interest on the certificates of indebtedness, $35,000,000. I put it in. It is not included in any of the appropriations which the Committee on Appropriations has made, and yet the gentleman from Illinois says we must measure this thing by the appropriations that have been made, not by the necessities of the case. He admits it ought to be there. Why did you not include it in your appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. What was that?

Mr. HILL. The interest on the bonds.

Mr. MADDEN. I certainly did. I included the $145,000,000 in the statement I made.

Mr. HILL. Yes; but where is it in your appropriation bills?

Mr. MADDEN. I was not speaking of the appropriations. I estimated that.

Mr. HILL. Oh, yes. It is easy enough to say it ought to be paid and that we ought to be guided by the appropriation bills rather than by the facts in the case, but the gentleman himself has not included it in the appropriation bills.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not on the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. HILL. I thought you were.

Mr. MADDEN. No; not now.

Mr. HILL. Then I think you know less about it than I thought you did. [Laughter.]

I said to the Secretary this: "Have you included in your estimates the increased pay of the Army?" He said, "No; it was only authorized by the House Saturday night." This was Monday morning. "Of course," said he, "we have not included it." That is $360,000,000 not included in the estimates. It is now authorized by act of Congress, but not included. I am coming to it again in a moment. Said I, "Have you included, as we have, a rough estimate of $400,000,000 to cover an additional estimate that is coming in from the Navy?" He said, "No; I have not." It did come in, $503,000,000, and is included now in the appropriation bills.

Then there is $100,000,000 more of deficiencies which will show up on the 30th day of June, according to the Secretary's own estimates, that must be paid out of this tax bill, deficiencies in the current revenues for the last fiscal year, making a total requirement of $4,760,696,785.37, not including any additional estimates that will come in between the 1st day of May and the day when this Congress adjourns, and $1,000,000,000 extra has already come in in one lump. But not including that, and I think not including the $100,000,000 given to be expended by the President in his own discretion——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Then, if I understand my colleague on the committee correctly, instead of the sum which we are about to raise being altogether more than is necessary, we shall have to levy additional taxes to meet it?

Mr. HILL. Yes. I will show you when I get to it.

Now, what happened? I have told you what was not included. The Committee on Appropriations, exercising their discretion and, in my judgment, exercising it wisely in some respects, struck out of those estimates $760,000,000.

Now, I want to show you how they did it. Striking out the $760,000,000 from the estimates, they reported a bill to the House, which we passed. The balance left was $3,986,696,784.27, to be provided for by two billions of bonds, and the remainder to be raised by taxation, so that it is not $1,800,000,000; it is $1,986,696,784 at least.

Now, what was it that they struck out? In the first place, there was $280,000,000 stricken out because of duplication of appropriations that were in last year's appropriation bills and thoughtlessly brought forward into this great estimate of $3,500,000,000 which the department had made. That ought to have gone out. Of course, we did not want to appropriate it twice. Then there was $144,000,000 stricken out which was in that estimate, to take care of the dependent wives and children of the soldiers who will be called from their work by draft during the next year, all stricken out. Do not you think that at least a part of that will have to be met during these 12 months, or you will get no army?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. That is a deficiency.

Mr. HILL. Yes. It is a deficiency. But it has all gone out, every dollar of it. They did it on the theory that the vote to take care of the dependent wives and children applied only to the National Guard during the troubles on the Mexican border. Every nation in this war, even Canada, is taking care of its dependent wives and children. We have got to do it or be disgraced in the eyes of the civilized world.

Every dollar of it has gone out, and you know you have got to pay it by and by. That is added to the $1,900,000,000. Fifty million dollars was taken out which was estimated because of the 20 per cent increase for soldiers in foreign service. It was taken out of the appropriation from the standpoint of the Committee on Appropriations—and I am not criticizing them—on the ground that the law applied to the past organization of the Army, and the authorization for the new army made no provision for extra pay, and that it would be covered in the double pay. I presume that we will not have to appropriate anything for that purpose.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. Is it the gentleman's idea that the conscripts or drafted men who have dependent mothers or widows and children—that the dependents will be provided for by the Government?

Mr. HILL. They are provided for in all other countries.

Mr. FOCHT. Can the gentleman say whether they will be by this country?

Mr. HILL. I am in favor of a reasonable allowance, and I proposed it first on this floor when the National Guard was provided for.

Mr. FOCHT. What shall I write to my constituents who want to know if this Congress is going to pass such a bill?

Mr. HILL. You can tell them that you are for it. Of course the gentleman can not control the House.

Mr. FOCHT. I am for it, to be sure, but I do not get the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. HILL. I said that I am in favor of it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can write his constituents and tell them that one of two things will happen. The soldier who is conscripted with a dependent mother would very likely be excused, but if not excused he will be taken care of, and also his mother.

Mr. HILL. I am glad the gentleman from Illinois is here. I want to ask him a question. A few days ago we authorized in the Regular Army and National Guard about a million men between the two.

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. HILL. We authorized the President of the United States to at once begin conscription in this country to raise two contingents of 500,000 men. Is not that true?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. HILL. And preparations are going on to-day to do it. When the conference report is adopted, as I understand it, the orders will go out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman 15 minutes more.

Mr. HILL. What do you suppose the Appropriation Committee has done? The pay of the Army which we authorized the other day will amount to $720,000,000, and they have appropriated $219,000,000. Now, suppose we do not pay them a cent until the first day of July, the pay will be $720,000,000 unless we change the law during the fiscal year of 1918. They have appropriated $219,000,000. Why? On the ground that we are not going to get the 2,000,000 men, that we are not going to get the 1,000,000, and if we do get 1,000,000 ultimately the full number of the Regular Army and the National Guard will only need to be paid for eight months of that time. You know as well as I do that if that is the fact the war is a failure at the start. You know that it will be absolutely necessary to come in here next December and make another appropriation bill to make up the pay of the Army and these other items and enact another tax bill then.

When are the taxes proposed in this bill to be collected? The income tax, corporation tax, excess-profits tax will not be collected until after next January. The statements of incomes are not due until the 1st of March next year, and the payments are required between that and the 15th of June. What are you going to do? It is easy enough to say that you will make a new appropriation in December to meet the items of deficiency.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I want to say to the gentleman that the retroactive income tax is due next September.

Mr. HILL. Yes; $110,000,000. Let me say that it is not a retroactive tax at all. We needed $110,000,000 to make up the amount, and this is an income tax for this year measured by one-third of what they paid last year. We could have made a normal tax of 5 per cent instead of 4 and got the same amount, and then you would not call it retroactive. It is simply a means of measuring. Even then I voted against it, but it is for this year only. We did not want to adopt a normal income tax of 5 per cent for future years. You will not get it again, and we only measure it by one-third of what you paid last year. It is an unfortunate expression to call it retroactive. The committee by a unanimous vote had at the beginning of its deliberations repudiated the suggestion made to it to reenact all of last year's income tax and substituted other taxes for the whole amount.

So we have got to lay the taxes now for 12 months. We can not lay taxes on the people to suit the convenience of the Committee on Appropriations in making its appropriation bills. They can hold back the pay for the Army now and appropriate for the rest of it in December. We have got to lay the taxes now and proceed to the collection of the money which we will need, amounting to nearly $2,000,000,000, before we can get a chance to lay another tax bill.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is it not the opinion of the gentleman that if the war continues, Congress will be called upon at the next session to lay another tax bill?

Mr. HILL. I have not the slightest doubt that notwithstanding the eighteen hundred million dollars we have laid this year we will be called upon to raise three billion six hundred million next year, or double the amount in taxes. I think our expenditures this year will be $10,000,000,000, counting the cost of financing the allies, and I think next year it will be $15,000,000,000, counting the cost of financing the allies. We might as well face this proposition like men and not pettifog about a tax on jewelry, the tax on automobiles, the tax on this, that, and the other. It is going to reach everybody before you get through with it.

Mr. GARNER. And these gentlemen who object to certain taxes in this bill ought to be prepared to offer a substitute which would raise an equal amount of money.

Mr. HILL. Absolutely. No man should rise on the floor and offer an amendment to the bill who is not willing to couple with it some form of taxation to supply the amount that he wants to take away.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I will suggest an amendment. Take the tax off the necessaries that you have in this bill and put it on the excess profits and the large incomes.

Mr. HILL. Yes; and another gentleman sits here who says that the excess-profits tax is all wrong and ought not to be levied. Which is going to have his way?

Mr. DOWELL. He says to put it upon the net profits.

Mr. HILL. You have got it on the net profits in the corporation tax.

Mr. DOWELL. But you have not enough. Put it on the large profits and you will get the amount.

Mr. PLATT. You could raise considerable by a check tax, as we had in the Spanish-American War.

Mr. HILL. Certainly; and I was in favor of that in the committee. I have no hesitation in saying that. I voted for it. I think I have shown you—at least, I have tried to show you—that we need eighteen hundred million dollars. I want to show you that a man who did not agree with that proposition in the committee, a colleague of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], set for him an example which he might well follow when he stood up and changed his views, and said, "Gentlemen, I am in favor of raising eighteen hundred million dollars, as called for by the administration, for I believe that if we answer that call with 80 per cent only, the first battle of this war is lost." [Applause.] I commend that patriotic statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

What have we got? We have a bill which, according to the estimates, gives us eighteen hundred million dollars. I have shown you that we need nineteen hundred million dollars or more. We are not going to get eighteen hundred million dollars from the bill, or anywhere near it, and that is something that you want to think about. Why? The best taxation authority in this country, Prof. Seligman, of Columbia University, reviewing the income tax, winds up with this statement, that you gentlemen should think about:

> Finally, another notable diminution of the yield from the income tax would follow the unfortunate exemption of interest on the new gigantic war debt. With every billion of new tax-free bonds there would be a reduction of from ten to twenty million dollars in the income tax.

We have authorized five and one-half billions this year of tax-free bonds, and it means scaling $110,000,000 right off your income-tax receipts which are put in here in this estimate, as any one of you can see. That is the first scaling. It is unnecessary for me to go into the reasons why Prof. Seligman is absolutely correct. Every one of you can figure it out for himself. For every billion of tax-free bonds that we issue you can scale $20,000,000 from the receipts of the income tax. That takes $110,000,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Prof. Seligman, I understand, is opposed to the tax-free bonds?

Mr. HILL. I do not know whether he is or not. I think that he is. I think that he claims that every bond ought to pay a tax. I said on the floor of this House when that bill came up, and in the committee, that the rate of interest ought to be 4 per cent. My judgment then is justified by the facts to-day. I am sorry that the interest is not 4 per cent.

What else is to come up? Just think of this proposition. We never have faced a problem of this magnitude before in the United States, and the peculiar situation has never before arisen. We have an income tax, we have a corporation tax, we have an excess-profits tax. Every one of those things depends upon the money a man makes, either individually or in a corporation. How are you going to determine what he makes? By taking out from the gross profits his expenses. Is he going to have any added expenses this year? Yes; eighteen hundred million dollars of taxation. That is going right into the debit side of the books of every business man and manufacturer in the United States, and you lose 4 per cent normal income tax at least upon eighteen hundred million dollars of taxation that he is going to charge up as expenses. Had you thought of that? That amounts to $72,000,000 a year that comes out of this estimate. It cuts down the eighteen hundred million dollars. Four per cent of the very taxes that we lay are coming out of the income, corporation, and excess-profits tax, and you can not stop it. Do you not suppose men will deduct the taxes upon the factory or the taxes upon their homes before they figure up the income tax? Then these taxes put in here to the amount of eighteen hundred million dollars are just so much deduction from the profits in this country for the coming year; and on that we lose 4 per cent anyway, and possibly in some cases as high as 15, 20, or even 47 per cent. I have taken it at the very lowest figure, so that on that thing alone you can deduct $72,000,000 from this estimate.

What else? We have an idea from this estimate that the postage, if we charge 3 cents for a 2-cent stamp and 2 cents for a 1-cent postal, will bring in just that much excess. It will not. It will stop the mailing of letters to a very large extent. I should like to say more than I have time to say or would otherwise say as to what my opinion is of this whole postage legislation. I wish it was not in the bill. I would tax the evil at its root. I would tax the advertising matter that goes through our mail at a rate of 10 per cent and let the newspapers transfer it to the buyer. I do not know of any reason why this Government should carry John Wanamaker's or Marshall Field's advertisements all over the United States at the expense of the rest of the taxpayers of the country. I would tax that right there and get $100,000,000 out of it. [Applause.]

The experience of Canada shows that they did not get the increase from 2 to 3 cents, because it reduced the number of letters that went through the mail. They did get about 40 per cent. We estimate 50 per cent, and that would be $14,000,000 more to come off.

Then there is another thing. We have made an exemption of 50 gallons of spirits in the hands of each retail dealer in the country, and there are 180,000 of them. How much new spirit do you suppose will be sold until that is used up that has 90 cents less tax to pay than the other has? In time it will come all right, but this year we lose $10,000,000 on that.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Are not all the spirits used practically taken out of bond?

Mr. HILL. I am referring to the exemption that is in the hands of the retailer and taken out of bond. There is an allowance of 50 gallons for each retailer. I do not refer to the matter the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. MANN. That is a barrel, and that does not amount to much. A statement has been made here and I desire to ask the gentleman a question in respect to it. If we forbid the use of grain—that is, practically forbid new distilling—the statement is made that we lose all of the revenue from the tax on alcohol. Is not the tax on alcohol practically paid, except for commercial purposes, on alcohol coming out of bond?

Mr. HILL. Yes; it is only paid when it comes out of bond.

Mr. MANN. Cutting off the new supply will not have effect for——

Mr. HILL. Probably not for two years to come. There is enough in bond to last the country two years.

Mr. CANNON. How much is in bond now?

Mr. HILL. I do not recall the exact amount, but I think somewhere in the neighborhood of 300,000,000 gallons.

Mr. HELVERING. Two hundred and thirty million gallons in bond.

Mr. HILL. I do not know. I have not the time nor the strength, gentlemen, to discuss the provisions of this bill. I am not going to do as the gentleman from North Carolina said he was going to do, vote for it with his eyes shut. I am going to vote for it with my eyes wide open, knowing just what is in it, I think, just what ought to be in it, and just what ought to be in it that is not in it, and yet I am going to vote for it. It is said that Napoleon said that there were three things which were absolutely necessary to the vigorous prosecution of war. The first was money, the second was money, and the third was money. This administration has asked us for $1,800,000,000, and as a Republican and as a citizen of the United States of America I propose to try to give it to them. [Applause.] I propose to give it to them to the best of my ability, whether it suits my political views or whether it does not suit my political views. A moment ago some one said that he was opposed to the excess-profits tax. So am I in the form in which it is computed. Another man said he was opposed to another tax and said that they ought to put the excess-profits tax in place of it. There is a difference of opinion. What are you going to do; surrender before you begin? I was going through Siberia 10 or 15 years ago, and at a city called Blagovestschenck I met a bright

German who was a cashier of a bank. Two weeks afterwards I met him again walking the streets of Stretusck, a thousand miles up the Amur River. I said to him, "Where in the world did you come from?" He said, "I came from Blagovestschenck; I left on the next boat after you." "Where are you going?" "I am going home." I said, "I am glad you are going to have a vacation." He was a fine fellow. But he said, "I am not going on a vacation." I said, "Then you are going on business, and you can make it a vacation trip." He said, "I am not going on business." I said, "What in the world are you going for?" I was a Yankee, traveling for curiosity. He said, "I am going home to do my last year's service in the army." I said, "Are you an officer in the army?" He said, "No; I am a private." "Do you mean to tell me that you are going several thousand miles and throw away the salary of a cashier in your bank to serve a year in the army at 6 cents a day?" He backed off, straightened up, giving a military salute, and said, ",Mr. HILL, it is my duty, you know." That service was not pleasant to him; this bill is not pleasant to me, and there are many things in it which I do not like, but I salute this Republic to-day and say, "It is my duty, you know." [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. In that one minute I desire to have printed in the RECORD some amendments which I propose to offer, because I understand we will have very little time in the discussion under the five-minute rule. The first amendment is:

Amend Title VIII by inserting at the end thereof the following:
"SEC. 14. One cent per pound on all canned meats, including all fish and fowl, to be paid by stamp on the original package, said stamp to be canceled in such way as to show in legible letters the month and year of canning."

The other amendment is as follows:

Amend Title I at the end of section 2:
"In addition to the income tax herein provided, 50 per cent of all profits derived from the purchase and sale of all articles of human food, where such purchase and sale has been or shall be made in any produce exchange, board of trade, or similar association, on margin, without the intention to actually deliver said articles of food."

I ask to have those printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks, and I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER]. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I know that this bill, if enacted, will mean sacrifice for many of our industries and to many of our people. That is to be expected in times such as these. No people can stand on the threshold of war or of any other great national trouble or calamity and not undergo sacrifice if the country is to be saved or catastrophe averted.

Sacrifice is the natural attribute of trouble, whether that trouble comes to us as a Nation or as individuals. I have, by my presence here in this Chamber and by word of mouth, supported this House and this administration in the work of preparedness and of building up a greater Army and a greater Navy, and I believe we have done the right thing, even though late in the day. It is true we have waited until we are forced to action by a situation which, even within a few months, some of us did not realize was confronting us. It is true, also, in my opinion, that this work of preparedness both of our Army and Navy should have been begun 20 years ago. Had it been so, the people of this country would not now have been called upon to make the sacrifices which are necessary because of our laxity in these matters over which we had control but action on which was postponed from year to year.

If there is any feature of this bill more than another which is objectionable it is the retroactive feature. This provision it would seem to me to be hardly necessary. It is one thing to have a tax staring you in the face, knowing that you must pay it, though it gives one the opportunity to arrange for it, but it is quite another thing, after a tax has been paid, or when money has been put aside to pay it, to then be called upon to increase that tax to a considerable extent, namely, 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. HELVERING. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. SNYDER. I will.

Mr. HELVERING. I will say the committee in considering that thought it preferable to compute it this way instead of increasing the excess-profits tax or the normal income tax, which would continue during the war, and this is only one year.

Mr. SNYDER. I understand that is the view the committee has taken of it. I am not going to vote against the bill on account of the position the committee has taken.

It seems to me some other method might have been found which would have realized the same amount of money to the country and placed the assessment before the people instead of behind them.

However, Mr. Chairman, I favor this measure. The funds with which to pay for these increases in our establishments for offense and defense must be secured. Patriotism and sacrifice and patriotism and Americanism walk hand in hand. It is possible that some industries may suffer, but that is nothing compared to the American boy or man at the front on the firing line. He makes a visible and vicarious sacrifice when he leaves his home, his family, and his country, perhaps, with a musket on his shoulder, to face ordeals which we escape and for which we are asked in this measure to soften for him as much as possible. It is our duty to see to it that that man is armed, clothed, fed, and protected beyond question. [Applause.]

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, I am a firm believer in the theory that this protection must in some degree come from the implements and conveyances of luxury; the luxuries enjoyed by the people of this country should be the first sacrifices to be made. If not made, they should be paid for at a rate which will enable us to be charitable to the poorer classes and not assist in weighing them down with additional burdens because of their willingness to couple their endeavors with their patriotism. So far as I am personally concerned, I shall contribute cheerfully all that is asked of me, and in so doing believe I am giving to my country the best support I can render at my time of life.

I have little patience, Mr. Chairman, with those who seek to shift their burden to other shoulders and thus evade a duty to the Nation which ought not to be evaded or tolerated, any more than is the evasion of the "slacker," who conceals his person from the arm of the law. It is for us who remain at home to bear the burdens thus put upon us and see to it that these burdens produce not only funds but assistance in other directions which is needed and when it is most needed.

By this I mean that there are industries in this country which should not be crippled by legislation, which will tend in any way to cutting down the measure of necessary supplies, not alone for our armed forces but for those who remain at home. It is the duty of the Government, I believe, to see to it that this result is accomplished. I am not speaking now of the production of luxuries, but of food, clothing, and other necessities of which war will demand an increased amount. Let us not lose sight of this important factor in time of war and in our haste to raise funds for the vast expenses of our forces. The latter can not be reduced; the former ought not to be.

The district I represent, Mr. Chairman, is patriotic to the core. It has, I believe, always stood for and demanded a greater Army and a greater Navy. It is composed of intelligent people who knew and now know that such an increase must be paid for, and it stands willing and ready to meet its share of this increased expense without murmur or quibble. No sacrifice will be too great for it; no demand will remain unmet in order that complete victory may be won. I am proud to represent such a district, firm in the belief that its response to any call from the Government, the State, or from within its local boundaries will be cheerfully and promptly met no matter what sacrifice may be entailed thereby.

Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal said about the receipt of telegrams from manufacturers in protest against the various drastic taxes in this bill. I want to say that I represent one of the greatest manufacturing and agricultural districts in this United States. Included in these manufactures are such as brass, cotton yarn, cotton goods, woolen goods, knit goods of every description, clothing, machine tools, cutlery, felt shoes, typewriters, furniture and desks, tanners, arms, both small and machine guns, steel office furniture, and others too numerous to mention, in all employing many thousands of men.

It will be noted that all of these come within the scope of prime necessities. But, gentlemen, I am proud to state, bearing out what I have said heretofore with reference to my district being patriotic to the core, I have not received a single telegram in protest from any one of these manufacturing establishments, and therefore I must assume that the people interested in these industries are willing without murmur to undergo the sacrifices that they will be called upon to make under this act, and it is a further source of pride to me as their Representative to feel that they are meeting this great issue in this splendid way. [Applause.]

Mr. HELVERING. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to discuss the bill, but to have printed in the RECORD two or three amendments which I propose to offer, or which some other member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads will probably offer when this bill comes up for consideration under the five-minute rule. I will ask that the Clerk read the amendments. There is one that I think will make clear the meaning and intention of the act in this particular. The act is not clear in the particular section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOON moves to amend by inserting, after the word "gallons," on page 9, line 20, the following:

"Provided, however, That such liquors in the custody of a court of bankruptcy in insolvency proceeding at the date of the passage of this act shall be exempt from this tax when the packages containing such are stamped by order of the said court showing in substance the terms of this exception."

Mr. MOON. Evidently the intention is to make that exception, which is very necessary, and I think it ought to be made clearer by this provision. Another one I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 47, line 22, after the word "valorem," strike out the period, all before the word "the," on the same line, and insert "except on white print paper."

Mr. MOON. That amendment, it is clear, is intended to prevent the tariff-tax increase in white print paper. It is not necessary for me to discuss that now.

The third amendment is the one that reaches the question of postal rates and is intended to preserve from additional postal tax the matter of the second class within the limited zone or radius fixed and to place the burden of the tax upon the advertising or commercial features of publications. The question has been fully discussed here, and I simply propose to give notice that I will offer that amendment, or it may be that some other member of the committee may offer it, although in different language. I want to get before the House the consideration of the question of the necessity for the preservation of the policy of the Government upon the question and at the same time the wisdom of taxing the advertising features of these magazines. I believe that under this provision we will remove from unjust and unfair taxation the weekly and daily newspapers of this country and yet raise larger revenues than under the proposed bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOON: Page 51, line 21, after the words "SEC. 1201," strike out the remainder of line 21 and all of lines 22, 23, 24, and 25 on said page and all of lines 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and all of line 6 to the word "Provided" on page 52, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Upon all newspapers, magazines, and other publications regularly admitted as matter of the second class, when mailed by the publisher and no other, 1 cent per pound: Provided, That parcel-post rates shall be charged upon all that portion of such newspapers, magazines, or other publications which is devoted to paid advertising matter, when addressed to any post office in the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth zones."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, that is all I desire to offer at present.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it may truthfully be said that I do not approach the discussion of this bill with any enthusiasm. I do not believe, as a rule, in encouraging too much taxation upon industry and enterprise. But we have reached a point where what we would like to do must give way to what must be done. In former discussions affecting revenue legislation I have stood generally against measures brought in by my friends on the other side. I was opposed to their original income-tax bill. I did not believe it was necessary to introduce that measure at the time, because we had a protective tariff working, and it was very effective and was producing all the revenue necessary to properly conduct the Government. But our friends on the other side having come into power thought otherwise, and they began the introduction of a series of revenue bills that have made the task of the business man and the manufacturer of this country harder than ever. I do not want that to be forgotten.

I realize, as my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] does, that we are confronted by a stern necessity—the raising of $1,800,000,000 to prosecute the war with Germany. I do not agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and others who have indicated that a less amount will suffice. The President has indicated what he wants done, and the Congress has given its support to the President in a declaration of war. The various departments are preparing to make their expenditures, and the country is ill at ease because Congress is not moving more rapidly to uphold the hands of the President. I have been sworn in to do what I can as a Member of Congress to help the President of the United States prosecute this war to a speedy and successful conclusion. I voted for the declaration of war with many misgivings, but I knew there could be no turning back; so when the President came forward with his drastic suggestion that conscription was necessary to sustain the honor of the country I voted for conscription.

Now comes the vital question of supporting the declaration of war and supporting the men who do the fighting. Are we to fall back at this point, and are these measures for which we have stood—whether reluctantly or otherwise—to go for naught? I think not. Our duty is clear. We must back up the action we have taken. I, for one, propose to support a measure to raise sufficient revenue by taxation to put the President and the various departments of this Government in position to speedily and effectively prosecute the war with Germany. That will be the best way to restore peace.

But I am approaching a discussion of this bill, as I said a moment ago, without any enthusiasm.

Gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee who have preceded me have indicated, with much good will and a commendable desire to promote our patriotic inspirations, that this is a unanimous report; that it comes out of the committee indorsed by both Democrats and Republicans as one man. I have hesitated to throw any monkey wrench into the machinery of the Committee on Ways and Means, as led by the eloquent gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], or into the majority now charged with the responsibility of supporting the President and pointing the way by which the war shall be conducted. But there was one member of the committee who was temporarily recalcitrant and who did not agree to sign the report, and for that reason he has not taken a very active part in the discussion up to the present time. His reason was that he desired to be free to offer certain amendments upon the floor when the proper time came. It had nothing to do with the desire to raise the $1,800,000,000, which he approved, but it was due to a desire to properly and equitably distribute the burden of taxation which must fall upon the people as a result of the passage of this bill.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. In the observations of the gentleman from Connecticut a while ago he made certain subtractions on account of the falling off of various incomes. Now, can you furnish an estimate of how much further of a subtraction must be made, or have you any idea as to what it will cost to collect this by way of additional officers to be appointed by the administration?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I had not intended to raise that question, but so long as the gentleman has raised it I will say that I have no doubt whatever that the $1,800,000,000 will not be net to the Government for the direct purpose of prosecuting the war. There will be enormous reductions due to the extra employees necessary here in Washington and elsewhere, and to other things that will have to be done in order to raise and disburse the $1,800,000,000. It may not be pleasing to some of my friends upon the other side—and by the other side I mean the Democratic side—though I am breaking away for a moment from the spirit of harmony that prevails with respect to this bill, if I observe that the taxes levied in this measure are levied almost exclusively upon the industries and upon the large centers of population. And the consumer will pay his share.

Now, I hope my farmer friends will not run away until I have a chance to fairly criticize this bill. This body is made up largely of Representatives of rural communities, and when the question of taxation arises there is usually a tendency to put the burden upon the manufacturing industries—not the man who tills the soil but the man who fabricates and manufactures the raw material that comes from the soil. I think this bill has been framed with scrupulous care to avoid laying an undue proportion of the burdens of war upon those who are not engaged in what we commonly designate as manufacturing industries. I am permitted to say this because I was in favor, so long as this is a war emergency measure and entirely abnormal, for I probably would not have approved a single paragraph of this bill in normal times—I was in favor of putting a fair proportion of the burden of taxation upon the big incomes of the country and upon the industries.

Mr. HILL. Do you not think that everything points to the fact that next year, certain resources of taxation having been exhausted, the farmer and other people will get it then?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I agree with the gentleman that something is coming to the farmer and probably will come to him in December, if it does not come to him in this bill. I am raising this little note of discord merely for the purpose of putting on guard a great proportion of the people of this country who may not immediately be touched by the ramifications of this bill; the prospect is that they will ultimately be touched and will have to pay in common with the rest of American mankind. I have no delight in making this prediction. We have gone into a war that means business, only most of the people have not yet come to realize it. The period of parades and the waving of flags is still popular with many of our patriotic citizens, but we are now about to enter the conscription period and taxes come after. Both are as sure to come as death itself. Folks who are cheering in moving-picture shows, or who are daily parading in the thoroughfares of our great cities, may have a rude awakening a few weeks hence when the sheriff comes around for the boys who must fill up the ranks. And when the tax collector comes, then the men and women of the United States will know that we are at war. It is a terrible business we have undertaken, and I do not want the farmer, whom I respect highly as a food producer, to overlook the fact that though he may have been exempted from conscription and the burden of military service he may escape from taxes, for his turn is coming. He is sure to be in this war one way or the other.

I do not say there is no virtue in this bill, but if there is one virtue in it, it is that it gives notice to the masses of the American people that they are up against a real war and must prepare themselves, both in the matter of taxes and privations and life and death.

This bill does tax heavily, doubly, the incomes of our citizens; it diffuses somewhat the taxes upon incomes in that it proposes to reduce the exemptions to $1,000 and $2,000. Teachers and preachers and professors and others who have been discussing war will be reached by this bill and will be asked to come up to the captain's office to pay. They will share in a patriotic sense and in a material sense along with those who have accumulated vast fortunes, who in proportion will be made to pay more than they did before.

I have supported the proposition, in this emergency, that large estates should pay, and pay well, and I have supported the suggestion that the profits of manufacturers in the great industries where thousands are employed should also pay even double what they paid before. This is war. If they are making vast sums of money out of war materials, they ought to pay. If they are making large sums of money in legitimate business, apart from the manufacture of war materials, then they should pay in fair proportion, and I suspect that this bill treats them fairly, up to the present time, seeing that this is war. Industries generally are covered by this measure; but we are carried by the bill from the large manufactories into the home; not so much the rural home, but into the home in the city where we have the gas and heat to pay for and the necessaries of life apart from the amusements and the ball parks.

It may not be generally known to those who have casually read this bill that we are passing a heavy burden to consumers in this measure. I do not want the country to get the impression that only the wealthy are going to pay. That is one of the reasons why I did not sign the report.

Perhaps we can get a little more real patriotism out of the people if they are made to understand that all will have to pay and that war is a deplorable and a deadly business.

Perhaps the people may understand, even the manufacturers of war materials may understand, that those who encourage war must pay for war. If they have to pay—those who call for war—then they will be quicker to demand the permanent peace to which we hope this country may soon return.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. It seems to me that a very fair proposal was made by gentlemen on the other side, that where opposition is offered to any particular object that is being taxed, a substitute be offered. Now, for instance, it is proposed, I believe, to tax the tickets for all entertainments—from a theater or a circus to the picture show, and including the tickets to the fair of the Union County Agricultural Society in my district—as well as the great publishing company that I spoke about this morning. What would you propose to substitute for the publishing company? What would you suggest as a substitute for the tax of something like $60,000 additional for the mailing of his paper, which added amount puts this big Grit Publishing Co. out of business?

What are you going to do about it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I suppose the company the gentleman refers to is one of the numerous companies that have wired to Washington that they will be "put out of business."

Mr. FOCHT. This is not one of those imposters that is a fraud put upon the Government in the shape of many advertising magazines, where they had five-sixths advertising and one-sixth reading matter. This is a newspaper publishing company, the big Grit Publishing Co., of Williamsport, Pa.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now I understand the gentleman.

Mr. FOCHT. Very well; then how are we going to save the Government?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is complaining about the postal rates in this bill. I grant that while some large publications will be heavily hit if the zone system carries, some of the smaller publications may be hit so heavily that they will be put out of business. If that eventuates, then revenue will be lost to the Government. There is no doubt about that. If that is true, then the estimate made by Mr. HILL a little while ago, as against the estimate made by Mr. MADDEN, of Illinois, will hold. We will have to raise more instead of less money in that event. If the gentleman wants substitutes for some of the paragraphs which he does not like, I will give them to him.

But first, let me observe that not only are income taxes imposed, and they are largely the result of industry; not only are profit taxes imposed, and they are wholly the result of industry; not only is liquor taxed, and, of course, liquor claims to be an industry, although much inveighed against—all these and more, originating in the large centers of population, are heavily taxed. I pause for a moment to say with respect to the liquor tax that one of the anomalies in the presentation of this bill is the recognition of liquor in certain sections of the country where prohibition has been advocated to such an extent that States have adopted it. From States adopting prohibition has come indorsement of the provision in this bill increasing the liquor tax to the extent of $150,000,000. We are to tax this alleged nefarious business; and yet it is proposed on the other side of this Chamber, and it may eventually be proposed on this side, to wipe out this very revenue that the advocates of prohibition have insisted shall go into this bill. I say this is one of the anomalies of the bill, and it may result in our having to tax some other products in the factory or on the farm to make good the loss that will necessarily ensue if those who desire prohibition shall be successful in destroying this revenue.

Mr. Chairman, many things apart from the city are not referred to in this bill at all. It is interesting that we should levy a 3 per cent freight tax upon the shipper and let the railroads out of it altogether; that we should put a tax of 10 per cent upon the individual passenger and relieve the railroad. These are amongst the anomalies which this bill presents. But on page 20 of the bill you will find a series of new schemes of taxation that are worthy your careful consideration, among them a tax equivalent to 5 per cent on the amount paid for transportation of oil by pipe line. Will you tell me who pays that tax? Will it be the great oil-refining companies for whom the Government of the United States makes vast expenditures in the improvement of its rivers and harbors and for whose benefit, largely, the Government War Insurance Bureau was established? No; they are not covered in this paragraph of the bill. It is the farmer, the individual owner of the oil wells, who is made to pay a rental for the use of the pipes owned by the larger companies.

On the same page you find a tax equivalent to 10 per cent on the amount paid for electric power for domestic uses, and a like amount for light or heat service. Oh, my friends in New York City, where gas is an absolutely necessity, where electric light is in common use, bear in mind that the 5 per cent tax does not go upon the company generating the light or the heat, but it goes on the consumer, and every housewife who has the accounting at the end of the month or three months' period for the gas and light that is used to light the dining room or the bedroom of the home will have that tax to pay. I observe that it does not apply except as "to domestic use," and that it has been interpreted to mean that it does not apply to the farm, where the electric power is used to churn butter or otherwise in conducting an industry; neither does it apply to establishments generating their own light and power. This tax is checked up for the ordinary consumer or renter of the small home. These matters are worthy of consideration as we pass along.

In the time I have remaining let me call attention to a few of the things that are studiously avoided in this tax bill. Far be it from me, when we should stand together as Americans shoulder to shoulder and with an eye single to American victory in the fight we are waging with Germany, to say one word that would seem to be political. But do you observe that several of the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury as to items that might be taxed are not included in this bill? Denatured alcohol, from which the Secretary of the Treasury says we could collect $5,000,000, it is not in this bill. An excise tax on sugar, which, according to the Secretary, might raise $92,000,000. The Secretary suggested that sugar should be made to pay, but it seems to be not good policy to include a sugar tax in this bill, and so sugar goes free of excise tax, while we hold coffee and tea. From an excise tax on glucose $6,000,000 revenue, the Secretary tells us, might be had.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman is in error when he says that we hold tea and coffee and let sugar go free. Sugar is taxed in the same way that we propose to tax tea and coffee, by a 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Sugar will have a distinct advantage in the domestic market, if I am not mistaken, over the sugar, tea, and coffee upon which no excise taxes are paid, except as to stock on hand at the time of the passage of this bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. This bill in no way refers to tea, coffee, or sugar except under the import tax—nine-tenths per cent on coffee, 1.8 per cent on tea, and half of 1 per cent a pound on sugar.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am referring only to the excise tax on sugar. The gentleman understands the difference between an excise tax and a tax at the port. The Secretary of the Treasury recommended an excise tax on sugar. But it was a consumption tax and the majority contended against a consumption tax. That would be unpopular.

The Secretary of the Treasury recommended that petroleum should be taxed. He said it would produce a revenue of $75,000,000. Why was petroleum left out of this bill? Petroleum is the raw product of which gasoline is made. Petroleum is the raw product from which a series of by-products are made by the great refineries, which have almost complete control of the market. But gasoline is what the farmer uses in the farm truck and automobile, and our good patriotic friends upon the other side of this House, who want us to stand as a unit, did not care to put a tax on their friends.

Mr. HELVERING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HELVERING. The gentleman does not mean to confine his remarks to those on the other side.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, the Democratic Party is in control of the Nation, and the gentleman from Kansas is an able exponent of that party.

Mr. HELVERING. The gentleman did not want to put a tax on consumption, and the gentleman does not contend that the Standard Oil Co.——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, we get the Standard Oil Co. on the excess profits and individual incomes. But the Standard Oil Co. gets a great deal. The Standard Oil Co. gets the benefit of our taking care of their ships and their insurance. We dredge the harbors so that they can get in and out, and for that they do not pay a cent.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. This bill taxes ginger pop and pink lemonade.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; that is so. But the gentleman could not get intoxicated on that.

Mr. PLATT. Why have they not taxed peanuts?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's question is more intelligent than I thought it would be. [Laughter.] The gentleman is entirely right. Peanuts are not mentioned, but they will come along under the 10 per cent ad valorem clause and the Japanese peanuts can not get in over the 10 per cent barrier.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Where do they raise the most peanuts?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, some are raised in North Carolina [laughter], and we have a very powerful gentleman from North Carolina on the Ways and Means Committee; but many are raised in Virginia. I have been told outside of the committee—because we can not reveal the secrets of the committee—that it is cheaper to buy Japanese peanuts in Chicago, from which the gentleman hails and to which he does so much honor, than it is to get them up from Virginia.

Now, you notice that advertising is not taxed in this bill, and while I am a newspaper man I think that in this great emergency advertising might have paid. It is one of the things that could fill the gap made by prohibition, if prohibition is adopted. We have left out of the bill newspaper and publication advertisements, but have held in the fellows that have electric-light signs and billboards. Therefore the newspapers and the publications go free on advertising. That is a discrimination, and it is such a discrimination as might be noted when the next bill comes along.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Is it not fair for the gentleman to state that the signs and the billboards do not go through the mails, and the newspapers and magazines do?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; that is fair, except that the proposition as presented by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] was that advertising should be taxed separately like everything else, and should be taxed at the office taking the advertisements. The mails did not enter into it. If the mails did enter into it the gentleman's criticism would be fair.

Mr. Chairman, long before the war the President of the United States came here when he had certain revenue difficulties that harmony now would conceal, when the country was going to the "demnition bowwows" because Democratic financial policies were not effective, and because we had to raise revenue by special taxation, and from this rostrum stated that there should be a tax levied upon bank checks. That was a tax that our friends did not care to report in this bill, and yet it would be a fair substitute for some of the taxes in this bill that are going to oppress the consumer.

Mr. MADDEN. Can the gentleman tell us how much that would raise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think I heard the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who is a wizard at figures, state that that would raise about $300,000,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. On bank checks?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; a graduated tax on bank checks such as is being placed upon notes, of 2 cents per hundred dollars or fraction thereof, or 20 cents per thousand dollars, would raise anywhere from $600,000,000 to $900,000,000 without any doubt.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would not be a tax upon the poor. That would be a fairly distributed tax and would not be a burdensome tax, and yet it was not put in the bill.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON. Does the gentleman favor a tax on bank checks?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would favor a tax on bank checks in an emergency like this, because I think it would be less oppressive than some of the taxes that are here levied.

Mr. DICKINSON. Does the gentleman purpose to offer an amendment to put a tax on bank checks in this bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If certain paragraphs are stricken from this bill, I would have no hesitation in offering an amendment placing a tax on bank checks. We must get the $1,800,000,000.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, the tax on bank checks, which the President of the United States favors, however, is no such proposition as a graduated tax, but is a straight, flat tax, as we had in the Spanish War.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was a straight, flat tax. Bank checks were recommended by the President as a source of taxation, but why were they not considered in this bill? The President also suggested stationary engines. Why were not they put in this bill? To be practical, there were some gentlemen on the other side who did not think it wise to worry the people with that kind of a tax. That was evaded just as was the tax upon gasoline. I suggest also that individual owners of automobiles are not taxed.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. It has been stated by a number of gentlemen who have participated in this discussion that there was no division between the parties on any question in the Ways and Means Committee. I notice that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has made frequent reference to "certain gentlemen on the other side" who did not favor or who did favor so and so. Is it true that there is any division in the Ways and Means Committee along party lines?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not believe the gentleman from Oklahoma was here when I opened my remarks, for I stated specifically there was "one gentleman" who did not sign the report, and that one gentleman being myself, I reserved the right to offer certain amendments on the floor. I did not sign the report because I wanted to express myself about this bill. I have indicated that I want to go along with the President and raise $1,800,000,000 in taxes, and I have also stated I wanted to raise it by an equitable tax. That is the reason I am making this statement, introducing certain specialties.

Mr. HASTINGS. But the gentleman has said some two or three times in his discussion that "the gentlemen on the other side," evidently referring to this side of the Chamber, did not want this or that kind of a tax. As I understand it the committee never did divide on any question along party lines. If that be true, the gentleman must be mistaken.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] not being a member of the committee, nor in the confidence of "the holy of holies," he can not induce me to violate the secrets of the sanctum sanctorum. [Laughter.] The gentleman comes from a territory where they produce a great deal of oil. Why should not the oil producer pay a little? Has he not been making money? Has he not been doing well? The Lord helps him very materially to his wealth, while the man who runs an automobile pays him; but I observe that he is not caught, and I observe also that the individual owner of the automobile is not caught. Look at the millions of automobiles in this country to-day, from the four hundred dollar new machine up to the five and six thousand dollar machine. Would it be a hardship upon the individual owner of an automobile to pay a portion of this tax? An automobile may be a necessity in some parts of the country, a truck is, but many automobiles are luxuries, and some families have more than one of them, and why should not they pay a fair proportion of this tax? But they are left out of this bill. The point is, of course, that the tax would be too general in its operation, it would touch too many of the low spots, it would bring too much opposition, and that may be the reason, perhaps, it is not in the bill. But I am giving notice to the gentleman and to the owners of automobiles, to the producers of oil and others, that there is another tax bill coming in December, and I am merely mentioning these things so that when we come to look around for things to levy upon the country will have notice, or at least those who are within the sound of my voice will.

Have you heard of the food corners? The increase in the price of food commodities, the high prices paid for butter and eggs and foodstuffs in the great cities—have you heard of the families that have almost gone starved because of the lack of the wherewithal to buy the product of the farm? Have you heard of the food riots in New York? Why not get a little from the man who produces that sort of material, or from the man who "corners" it? The newspapers reported a day or two ago that somebody had made "a strike" of $3,000,000 on the grain exchange in Chicago. Do you not think that is a fruitful field for war taxes? But that is not covered in the bill.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, will be gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. CURRY of California. Does the gentleman not think that is a fruitful field for lynching?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I agree with the gentleman as to that. I think the man who in these times will deliberately make money out of the very poverty of the people who are patriotic and who are bearing the burdens of this war might be worthy of a lynching bee; although as a lawmaker I can not advocate such a course.

Mr. CANNON. I think it was reported in the newspapers that Mr. Joseph Leiter had made a profit of $3,000,000, and I see it is denied by him in the newspapers, but he has not informed us whether it was $10,000,000 or $30,000,000 that he lost in attempting to bull the price of wheat some years ago.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois refreshes my memory and rather improves upon the suggestion of the gentleman from California, because I read yesterday in one of the newspapers that Mr. Joseph Leiter, president of the Army League, a patriotic body that wants war and wants it quickly, has denied that he made $3,000,000 or any other sum in the last 30 years, and intimated that anyone who would be guilty of speculating in these food products should be lynched. That was Mr. Leiter. Are you plagiarizing, my friend from California?

Mr. CURRY of California. Sometimes the gentleman's thoughts and mine run in the same channel.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I notice that the reported thoughts of Mr. Leiter and the gentleman from California run in the same channel as to the lynching question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman; he has been very civil to me.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. PLATT. If a man makes $3,000,000 on the Chicago Exchange in grain, does he not have to pay half to the Government under this bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He would if found; but the man who is able to make $3,000,000 on the Chicago Exchange out of food products in war time is usually slick enough to avoid the Government's agent when he comes around.

Mr. PLATT. If he does not put it in his income-tax return he swears to a false return, does he not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; but have you heard of anybody being arrested for false returns? I have a large correspondence showing that the income tax is collected extensively in certain States and that in certain other States it is not collected at all, which would indicate that some gentlemen are avoiding the payment of taxes. The Secretary of the Treasury has said in private, if not in public, that public notices should be published in certain States with respect to those who avoid the payment of taxes. I did not intend to refer to that, but inasmuch as the gentleman has introduced the subject, I will say there are 8 States—Connecticut, Illinois, Massachusetts, New York, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Ohio, and Pennsylvania—that last year paid $53,839,000 of the total income tax of this Nation; and that 12 other States—Alabama, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia, all having powerful influence in the House of Representatives and in the Senate and with the administration—paid only $3,109,000 of the income tax. The total income tax paid by all the States in 1916 was $67,900,000. Now, remember that this little handful of New England and Northern States paid $53,000,000 of that $67,000,000, and that this great group of States that I have mentioned—I will not be sectional about it, but the geography will speak for itself—paid only $3,109,000.

Mr. HEFLIN and Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thought I would get a rise from somebody on that. [Laughter.] I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the gentleman seriously think that the income tax is paid for geographical reasons rather than by reason of the possession of wealth?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has asked a question which I answer in this way: No greater fortunes, relatively, have been made anywhere in war times than out of tobacco and cotton. The southern banks are overflowing with money just now, and they are getting their money from cotton, which is an American monopoly. Cotton is a munition of war, and while other munition makers in the States are taxed to the limit in this bill, cotton does not pay a cent.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. From what statistics does the gentleman quote that income-tax data?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Nineteen hundred and sixteen; and the amount paid by the great State of Texas, from which the gentleman hails, is $900,000.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman know——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the amount paid by the State of New Jersey, which could be put in Texas five or six times over, was $2,900,000.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman know that in 1914 the cotton crop was sold for an average price of about 8 cents a pound, or a loss of at least 2 to 3 cents a pound on the cost of production?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I remember the appeals which were brought to us several years ago by our friends from the cotton fields. Our northern mills had also been suffering. I have a very vivid recollection of speeches made upon the floor at that time, when we were asked to buy a bale of cotton—when $50 was the standard price throughout the country—but I have not heard that cry during the last two or three years. The first two American ships which went down before this American war opened, sunk not by a submarine but by mines in the British Channel, were the Carib and the Evelyn. They were carrying cotton for the purposes of war. You can not shoot off a gun of any magnitude without the use of cotton. It has been a bone of contention of the warring nations of Europe, and the States producing cotton have availed themselves of it. They have been overflowing in "milk and honey," and yet cotton is not included in this bill.

I reserved the right in committee to say something about this bill on the floor, because I hope and expect to introduce an amendment calling attention to the fact that cotton has been prosperous and that cotton ought to pay. When the time comes I shall ask that a tax of at least two and a half dollars a bale be imposed upon that magnificent product of American plantations.

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. DICKINSON. Does the gentleman also wish to put a tax on wheat and corn and potatoes; if not, wherein is the difference?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Inasmuch as Mrs. Moore pays $2.50 a basket for potatoes at the present time, I would answer yes; as a war measure and to regulate prices for the farmer as well as the consumer, yes. As to grain, why could it not be taxed on the cars? It has been profitable.

Grain could be taxed in the cars and in the elevators. Bear in mind that grain held up in the United States for export and kept from the people here who need it raises the price of bread to the American consumer and pays nothing into the Treasury of the United States. They have a complete monopoly—those who export the cotton and the food products of the United States. They have the poor people of this country by the throat, so to speak. The Constitution of the United States prohibits an export tax, which would bring something into the Treasury of the United States, but under this bill what comes into the country will now pay.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the gentleman will permit, if you bring it into this country the people pay?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; but a duty on imports is not a direct tax. That helps the Treasury.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I wanted to see if I understood you correctly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The importer will pay 10 per cent under this bill upon everything that comes into the United States, and he will pay it under the stress and necessity of the administration which needs money to carry on the war. It was the only recourse the committee had of raising the difference between the articles specially taxed in the paragraphs of this bill, and the balance of $300,000,000 needed to make up the $1,800,000,0000. In this particular the representatives of the Democratic Party got down from their free-trade high horse and became Republican protectionists. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] 10 minutes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to criticize the imposition of any tax provided for in this bill. I do not intend to suggest an abatement of a single penny of revenue sought to be provided by the terms of this measure. I do not intend to suggest that the burden of this tax or of any of these taxes be shifted from the persons who, under the terms of the bill, are supposed to pay them upon some other class of persons. But I do want to call attention to one phase of this bill with reference to the sections imposing taxes on beverages known as soft drinks. I have no objection to the taxes thus imposed upon these beverages, nor have I any objection to the manner in which the taxes are sought to be collected. But it occurs to me, or my understanding of this particular article is, that it fails in the object which it obviously intends to bring about. And I invite the attention of the committee to this state of affairs, with a suggestion that it ought to be taken up and corrected, as I think it can be corrected, without any very great trouble. The intention, as shown by the report and by reading of the bill itself with reference to the tax on soft drinks, is that these beverages should pay a tax, figured out to be approximately 2 cents per gallon. These beverages are practically water charged with carbonic-acid gas, and flavored. Now——

Mr. DYER. The gentleman does not mean that all the so-called prohibition drinks are composed of those ingredients?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Oh, no. Some of them have opium, cocaine, and other things in them, but I mean the particular beverages that come under the class of this particular taxation which I am now discussing.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman does not include the celebrated product known as "Bevo," made from cereals?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No. Paragraph (b) of section 308 provides that "beverages manufactured and sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer of the carbonic-acid gas used in carbonating the same" shall pay "a tax of 2 cents per gallon." (d) Provides that all carbonic-acid gas intended for use in the manufacture or production of carbonated water or other drinks—that is, these drinks that have been enumerated in paragraph (b)—shall pay a tax of 8 cents a pound.

Now, as a matter of fact, the average market price to-day of carbonic-acid gas per pound is 5 cents. Therefore it is perfectly obvious that the intention of the framers of this measure was not to tax the manufacturers of the carbonic-acid gas, because there is no tax on the carbonic-acid gas which is made by the people who at the same time use it in the manufacture of these soft drinks; in that event it is not subject to taxation, but the product itself, the sarsaparilla and ginger ale, has a 2-cents-a-gallon tax. Now, the object of this is merely to provide for the assessment and collection of a tax which will figure out to be about 2 cents a gallon on these soft drinks, by requiring the seller of the gas to the producer of the soft drinks to collect at the time he sells it, over and above the 5 cents he gets for the product, a tax of 8 cents, because a tax of 8 cents on the material or the gas would, when charged into the water, make a tax of about 2 cents a gallon. I think that is a reasonable and fair and practicable way of collecting this tax, in so far as the ordinary sales are concerned. But the difficulty is that a very large proportion of this gas is sold and will continue to be sold for the next 9 or 10 months, at least, under written contracts entered into in the past, which provide for a fixed price for the gas, and therefore preclude the collection of this 8 cents by the gas men from the manufacturers of the soft drinks.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield? I will yield him more time if he desires it. Let me say to the gentleman it was shown in the committee that 1 pound of that liquid gas would charge 4 gallons of water.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. The committee was desirous of putting a tax of 2 cents a gallon on soft drinks. Therefore 1 gallon of the liquid gas would charge 4 gallons, which would be 8 cents at 2 cents a gallon, and the tax instead of being put upon the soft drink itself, which would require a stamp, it was decided by the committee to put a tax of 8 cents a pound on the liquid gas, which would be equivalent to 2 cents a gallon on fully charged water.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes, sir. Now, I will say to the gentleman I understand that, and I have no objection to it. I think it is a just and equitable tax. I think 2 cents a gallon is not excessive upon these soft drinks, and I think the method of collecting this tax——

Mr. HELVERING. If the gentleman will yield, I might say in way of explanation that this morning we had a meeting of the Ways and Means Committee, in which an agreement was made to an amendment which will allow the contract price to be added on when the contract was made prior to the declaration of war.

Mr. FORDNEY. I was with the gentleman, but do not agree with the method of putting the tax on liquid gas.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I think with an exception covering running contracts it is a fair method of collecting a tax, and, so far as I know, nobody has raised a valid objection to it.

Mr. BLACK. About how long do these contracts run?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The contracts are largely entered into in the months of October, November, December, and January. That is the slackest season for the sale and distribution of these beverages, which are in greatest demand during the hot months of summer.

Mr. BLACK. They do not run for more than a year, do they?

Mr. LEHLBACH. They average about a year. I do not know of any contracts that run longer than a year; but to show that this condition resulting from existing contracts is not a trivial condition and only affects a slight percentage of the trade, I want to call attention to these figures. According to the last available figures there are about 60,000,000 pounds of carbonic-acid gas used in the manufacture of beverages. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], stated on the floor that since those figures were compiled the use of soft drinks had greatly increased, and that possibly the consumption of carbonic-acid gas for this purpose had doubled or possibly trebled, so that we may assume that we may have almost 100,000,000 pounds of this gas used for this purpose annually.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Certainly

Mr. MANN. Do I understand from the gentleman that under the terms of the bill where a manufacturer has agreed to sell carbonic acid gas for 5 cents a pound he would be required to pay a tax of 8 cents a pound?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do. That is what I mean.

Mr. MANN. Out of his receipts?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Out of his receipts.

Mr. MANN. He would be minus 3 cents a pound. That is the situation.

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is the situation. Now, in order to get a good grasp on the situation it is well to take a specific example.

Mr. MANN. It shows very great care in the preparation of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me a minute to explain?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HELVERING. I will say to the gentleman that it would be much more convenient to this industry to leave the imposition of the tax remain in this way instead of by putting stamps on the bottles.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think it would be more convenient to a man selling gas at 5 cents a pound to pay 8 cents a pound on it?

Mr. HELVERING. There is an amendment, which does not appear in the bill yet, that will allow him to pass it on.

Mr. MANN. I am glad that the Committee on Ways and Means is learning something about this bill.

Mr. HELVERING. I am sorry we did not have the gentleman's information before.

Mr. MANN. If you had, you would learn more.

Mr. HELVERING. I am glad to have the gentleman's information.

Mr. LEHLBACH. As an illustration, I may point to a concern in my congressional district, in the city of Newark, which I have the honor, in part, to represent. This concern is capitalized at $700,000. It does an annual business of almost 4,000,000 pounds of carbonic-acid gas per year. Eighty per cent of the coming year's business is under contract, where the contracts have already been entered into, and the price has been fixed at 5 cents per pound in those contracts. They can not pass this tax along under the bill as it stands now. Therefore they will receive on the gross returns of that contract business from their purchasers $125,000. That is their gross receipts on 80 per cent of their whole business; and on those gross receipts they would be compelled by this law as it stands to pay into the Treasury of the United States $200,000, which is over one-fourth of their entire capital; and they can not do it if this bill is allowed to stand unamended as it is. It is perfectly evident that they had better cancel all of their contracts, supply this 2,500,000 pounds of gas free to their customers and thereby save $75,000. They would have to pay out $200,000; and inasmuch as the tax is only on sales, if the gas is not sold they can not be taxed for it.

Now, section 309 provides that the "manufacturer, producer, bottler, or importer shall make monthly returns under oath to the collector of internal revenue for the district" in which he is located "containing information necessary for the assessment of the tax." Now, my suggestion to the committee is an amendment, and I hope that this amendment will be given consideration, unless another amendment has already been prepared which would provide for a remedy such as is suggested by this amendment. The amendment is as follows: At the end of section (d), on page 15, that imposes a tax of 8 cents a pound, and under the terms as it now stands imposes that tax on the manufacturer when he sells the gas, strike out the period, put in a colon, and add these words:

Provided, That whenever sales are made under a contract in writing, entered into before the 1st day of May, 1917, by the terms of which the selling price of the carbonic-acid gas is fixed, such tax shall be paid by and collected from the purchaser

That is the intention of the act, and, if you say so, that will remedy this difficulty. The point that it would hamper the collection of the tax to collect from the purchaser rather than from the seller is not well taken, because section 309 provides that the man who sells the gas shall make returns to the collector, and all that is necessary to be done under this amendment is to send the tax bill to the purchaser. Then you would do what you intended to do, and you would not have harmed anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has again expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I am in the same fix as the gentleman. My time has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Can not the gentleman from Michigan give me a minute?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will; but we will have to reduce somebody else.

Mr. HOWARD. I am interested as the gentleman is. The condition is the same in my city. What are you going to do about the 8 cents a pound on this that is not contracted for? A manufacturing establishment in my district has probably got four-fifths of its output already contracted for at 5 cents a pound. He will lose 2½ cents a pound by this unamended bill. Twenty per cent of his business is not contracted for.

Mr. LEHLBACH. He pays 8 cents and gets it from the man he sells it to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. KITCHIN] happily said that he expected to support the bill which he presented. The rest of us are nearly all agreeing with him and following in his wake. I, however, indorse him in that matter as I do his politics in other matters, if at all, entirely without recourse. [Laughter.] I say that I shall vote for this bill, but not as he said he would vote for it, with his eyes closed. I expect both of my orbs of vision to be full and flaming when I vote for this bill. I shall vote for it for one special reason, and none other. If I were asked to vote for it under any other circumstances, and should feel so inclined, I should certainly feel constrained not only to close my eyes, like the chairman of the committee, but to stop my ears, shackle my gorge, and cocaine my conscience. [Laughter.]

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question of my colleague?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DICKINSON. Was not that remark that the gentleman refers to on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means directed especially to the imposition of the 10 per cent duty tax, and not to the entire bill? [Laughter.]

Mr. SLOAN. Yes. The trouble with the chairman was that he can appreciate and enjoy the fly, but he has no appreciation for the real ointment. [Laughter.]

Mr. DICKINSON. I simply wanted to get it stated correctly.

Mr. SLOAN. That is the one redeeming feature, so far as national policy is concerned, contained in the bill; but that is aside from the reason I am supporting this measure.

Mr. DICKINSON. Allow me further to say that in the absence of the chairman of the committee I simply wanted to get a history of the facts as contained in his speech.

Mr. SLOAN. Yes; I would like to have, if possible, the facts kept straight from that side of the House once. I am glad the gentleman from Missouri has undertaken the task, because I do not know anybody that could do it with greater prospect of success.

Now, I shall support the bill. What the chairman of the committee said is true. There was practically no partisanship in its makeup. We were about the table. We built up this bill as best we could and present it with no particular pride of architecture or construction, but as the result of grim necessity. There was only one appealing irresistible reason prompting us all to support it. That reason was that twin monosyllable of hell known as "war." That is the reason I propose to vote for it with my eyes open, just as I voted against the first declaration, as I voted for the bond issue, and as I opposed conscription. This is the least of the four propositions. I expect to vote for and support the administration recommendation. Because on matters of war itself and the matter of compelling men into the service I take no suggestion from any man or any power on earth; but if it is a mere matter of money, I think now that the Congress has spoken and all our judgments have been merged into one, the war situation being a reality, it is our duty to do all that we can with men and munitions, with blood and with gold, and with all the means of modern civilization to meet the power of modern barbarism and make the American will dominant in this great struggle. [Applause.]

Before passing I want to say as to partisanship and nonpartisanship, which have been discussed, that within the memory of some Members on the floor of this House there has been a change in the two wars that have been waged. Gentlemen who were here in 1898 will remember that the same harmonious situation between the two sides of this Chamber was not observed in raising money to carry on the struggle that the Congress had then declared. The Republican Members are making a record the opposition of that day might well envy.

While favoring some features of this bill, tolerating others, and vigorously opposing still others in the standing committee, and finally agreeing to support the bill as a war measure, I refused to indorse the postal section of the bill and reserved the right to submit an amendment to the second-class rate in the Committee of the Whole.

Much has been said by speakers on either side of this Chamber about the newspapers deserving this increase of rates as a punishment for unduly exciting the war spirit of the country. As to that fact, I submit no palliation or defense. Sufficient to say that the work of our standing committee was to raise revenue and not to conduct a punitive expedition.

The postal section is at best a regulatory one, seeking to adjust the proper contractural relations between the Post Office Department and the publishers. As such it should be brought up by the Post Office and Post Roads Committee. As to the statement made several times on the floor that if we did not settle this matter now under stress of war it never could be done, permit me to say that under that cover more crimes against our Government will be committed than can be conceived of by the most acute man in America. Of the three departments of Government the legislative has more nearly adhered to the original plan of the Constitution than either of the others. Let us not give a glaring example of using the pressure of war for civic purposes to other branches of the Government.

I call your attention to a bill introduced by Chairman MOON, of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee, in which he places in one mail zone of 300 miles the first three parcel-post zones. This was well said by him on the floor of the House the other day to accommodate the daily press, whose average distance of carriage is 255 miles; agricultural papers, 490; while magazines are 920 miles.

Statements have been made by various people, including the Hughes Commission and departmental officials, as to the cost of carrying and delivering second-class mail.

That mythical overhead charge, concerning which there has been much debate, may be great or small. It is, in any event, the same for a long or short haul. It is largely an estimate made by bookkeepers of the part of the expense of an establishment which must in large part be maintained for other branches of the mail that should be charged to second class.

But the part paid for carriage is definite and certain. It is 1 cent per pound for every 200 miles. A zone system should provide for that first and the overhead expense should be met equitably along the line.

Under this rule the provisions of this bill would pay the carriage average distance in the first mail zone and leave 1⅝ cents per pound to apply on the overhead. Under the second mail zone, after paying the carriage, there would be 1¼ cents to apply on the overhead. Under the third mail zone, after paying carriage, there would be three-fourths of a cent to apply on overhead. In the fourth mail zone it would lack 2 cents of paying carriage and, of course, nothing to pay on overhead. In the fifth mail zone the carriage deficit would be 3 cents and nothing for overhead.

I shall submit an amendment combining the third parcel-post zone with the first and second, making the first mail zone one of 300 miles; making the second mail zone the fourth parcel-post zone at 3 cents per pound; and the third mail zone the fifth parcel-post zone at 4 cents per pound, as it is in the bill, and leaving the other zones and rates as they are in the bill.

This will make the mail-zone radii as follows:

	Cents.
First zone, up to 300 miles	2
Second zone, 300 to 600 miles	3
Third zone, 600 to 1,000 miles	4
Fourth zone, 1,000 to 1,800 miles	5
Fifth zone, beyond 1,800 miles	6

While the above plan will tend to equalize the system and reduce the discrimination against the newspapers and farm papers, yet it will only accomplish it in part.

If we assume the parcel-post zones and rates to be at once compensating and equitable, then we have the remarkable condition of the proposed mail rates in the first and second mail zones more than 50 per cent larger than the parcel-post rates. While in the third mail zone the rate is 12½ per cent less than the parcel-post rate and 50 per cent less in the more distant zones.

I submit the following tables:

Rates in bill.

	Rate per pound.	Average haul	Cost for average haul.	Left for overhead, per pound.

I suggested to Judge MOON, chairman of the Post Office Committee, when he appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means that if the Post Office Committee would submit a good, fair, wholesome amendment to the postal section of this bill I would be glad to support it and accept the judgment of that committee in advance as final and binding on me.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did the gentleman hear read a little whole ago an amendment which the gentleman from Tennessee, Judge MOON, proposed to offer?

Mr. SLOAN. I heard the one the gentleman refers to. I think that amendment, as far as I was able to consider it, is a wholesome amendment. It is based on the proposition that we are one vast country, and that the intelligence of New England and the intelligence of the Pacific coast should mingle. That no great barriers or oppressive obstacles should be placed in the transmission of intelligence from coast to coast or from North to South. Unfortunately, there has grown up upon this medium of intelligence what might be called an excressence of business advertisement. It is a burden on the postal facilities of the Government, involving every year a considerable loss. I think the true way to dispose of it, now that we have a parcel-post system, would be wherever the publishers present their publications within any of the zones, they should be carried at a flat rate to any part of the country for the reading matter, while the advertising should pay the parcel-post rates. That can be done very easily, and, if followed, the present loss to the Government will be greatly decreased.

In carrying the mail the cost of carriage is a flat average rate of 1 cent per pound for every 200 miles. It is estimated that there is an overhead charge of from nothing up to 4½ cents. That can not be known definitely. It is estimated by the bookkeeping department of the Post Office Department and consists of a portion of the time of certain clerks and other employees necessary who look after the first, third, and fourth class mails. It is merely a matter of classification as to how much is overhead charges due to the second-class mail and how much is not. But the carriage rate is 1 cent for every 200 miles. So, that being definitely known, with the the establishment of the zone system the first concern would be to pay the carriage. Then if there is anything left over, let it be applied to the overhead charge.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman mean by carried for 1 cent for 200 miles?

Mr. SLOAN. The testimony of those who claim to know, especially the First Assistant Postmaster General, was the cost of carrying one pound is 1 cent for every 200 miles.

Mr. MANN. The average cost?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes; the country over.

Mr. MANN. Then it costs 15 cents to carry a pound from New York to San Francisco?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes; if it is 3,000 miles.

Mr. MANN. Then it only costs a quarter of a cent or half a cent from New York City to Philadelphia?

Mr. SLOAN. Oh, it is more than 100 miles from New York to Philadelphia, is it not?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows the charges are not uniform.

Mr. SLOAN. No, but they should be.

Mr. MANN. But they are not.

Mr. SLOAN. What I know is the undisputed testimony in the Hughes report, in the Ashbrook hearings, and in the testimony of Mr. Koons just a few days ago before our committee; so there is no question about it. I never heard it questioned.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. According to that theory the whole rate of cost ought to be charged for carrying a letter from Washington, D. C., to Nome, Alaska, 5,000 miles away.

Mr. SLOAN. I presume the stamp upon the letter would pretty nearly pay for it. Its weight is small. Consider the number of letters it would take to make up a pound and I think you would find that it would pretty nearly pay its own carriage. The newspapers of the country need no encomium from me for the especial service they will be performing from now until this war closes. They will carry the news from day to day, whether it be good or bad; whether it conveys to the waiting fathers and mothers an account of the day of battle in favor of our boys or whether it will bring tidings of reversal and, mayhap, the darkest news. That part of the service will be especially appreciated by the American people in the coming years of the war, as it has never been before. Now, to say that the newspapers within that zone under 300 miles should be compelled to pay more than twice as much overhead charges as they do anywhere else, and where in the greater part of the country the magazines would not even pay the carriage, it is absolutely unfair to the newspapers and unfair to the farm papers of which I have spoken.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, how many zones are there in the district from Kansas City, Mo., to the farthermost part of Nebraska?

Mr. SLOAN. There would be four zones. It would be the first, which is 50 miles—I mean the parcel-post zone, and you want to keep those separate from the zones in this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Make it the newspaper zones.

Mr. SLOAN. It would be in the third newspaper zone. The first newspaper zone proposed in the bill is 150 miles. The next is out 300 miles, and the next 600 miles, which makes it 600 miles, which would carry it to the farthest part of Nebraska.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Who will divide these newspapers up into zone distribution, the Postal Service?

Mr. SLOAN. The bill provides that the Postmaster General shall require or may require the newspapers to make up their publication by zones in such manner as will make it easy to handle. The way the newspapers are shipped now they are more easily handled by a great deal than the average parcel-post matter. Yet in these first two zones proposed by the committee in the bill on everything over 4 pounds the parcel post is cheaper than the newspaper.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire in closing this matter to say that should the amendment of the chairman of the Post Office Committee be presented, I think it would be fair to all the publications, but if it is not presented and does not receive favorable action of this committee, then I shall insist upon my amendment being presented.

I desire to speak now with reference to two other features of the bill. First, as to the objection with which it is met upon the ground that we are raising too much money. Eighteen hundred million dollars is an enormous sum. Figuring it out in one way it would take 100 cars of 20 tons each to haul it if it were reduced to gold. It was quite a task for the committee to undertake to raise that amount. But I think the committee should have done so. I do not think that this House can refuse to adopt the bill on the ground of the amount of taxation it involves. Regardless of what individuals may do, the Congress of the United States must keep faith with the country.

We must especially keep faith with the young men to whom we have said you must respond to the country's call and fight its battles. At the recommendation of the President of the United States war was declared. At his recommendation $5,000,000,000 of bonds were provided for. At the recommendation of the President of the United States the young men of the country between 21 and 31 years of age were, whether they would or not, told that they would have to go and fight the battles of this Nation on foreign soil.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. I will.

Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman means between 21 and 31 as proposed in the bill now going through the two Houses?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes; up to the day they are 31, as I understand it. When the proposition for war and the proposition for financing the war and the proposition for conscription was before us, the young men of the country were told—and I never heard an objection to it until after conscription was by Congress fastened upon them—that half of the expense of this war would be raised by taxes and the other half by bonds. That was determined in advance. There was an agreement and promise to the young men of the country that if they submitted to conscription and fought our battles, when they came back they would not be called upon late in life to pay the expense of the war, as some of them had paid in life and blood the obligations of battle. They were given to understand that the expenses of that war on foreign fields would not be theirs to pay long after this war had closed. That promise was made—made by the Executive of the Nation, indorsed by every man in this House when he voted for war, when he voted to finance the war, and when he voted for conscription. No man in this House and no man in America can afford to repudiate that solemn pledge, even though it takes half his profits, or all of it, even though it takes part of his capital.

Some of those young men are business men. They lose all their profits. What becomes of their capital? They lose part or all of it. What is proposed? Gentlemen who voted for the bond issue, and voted especially against an amendment which I presented, are absolutely—morally, politically, and patriotically—estopped from claiming that we ought to issue more bonds and levy less taxes. In that amendment I asked this House to say when those bonds should be paid. The House refused to do it, but left it to the judgment and wisdom of the Secretary of the Treasury. He has issued these bonds at 30 years.

The average age of the man called out to fight the battles will be 26. To 26 add 30 years, the term of maturity of those bonds, and you have men at the maximum of their earning capacity as business men. Remembering that they fought the war, which I hope and expect will be successful, they will be confronted with the payment of $5,000,000,000 of bonds. Who will stand in his place to-day and say to them, "We will add $500,000,000 bonds for them to pay 30 years hence?" That is not all. I raised another question when the bond bill was pending. There was a dispute as to facts, but we will let that pass at this time. There was a provision that those bonds should bear 3½ per cent interest. Further, should other bonds be issued during the period of the war, at a greater rate, that very fact would automatically advance the interest on the $5,000,000,000 bonds to the rate which the new issue would bear. There is not a man here who would for a moment say to the Secretary of the Treasury if we were to issue, as has been suggested, $500,000,000 more bonds that they could possibly be floated at less than 4 per cent. If we were to float them at 4 per cent, automatically these $5,000,000,000 3½ per cent bonds would become 4 per cent bonds. An additional one-half per cent for 30 years would make an additional amount to be paid by those who came back and others of $750,000,000. More than that, these $500,000,000 that are suggested, from various quarters, would bear 4 per cent, and the interest to be paid on these as they came due from year to year to be paid when they came back would be in all—at 4 per cent for 30 years—$600,000,000. Then add $500,000,000 principal to be due, the additional interest $750,000,000 and $600,000,000, and you will have an additional burden of $1,350,000,000, all started from this proposed bonding when taxation should be followed. I want to know who in this House or elsewhere will stand up and say that these boys should go and fight and in addition to going and fighting the war that they should be made to pay the expense.

I read a very interesting speech quite recently. I heard it when delivered. You will find it on page 612 of the present RECORD:

> I am one of the American people who is ready to pay my share of the obligation [applause], and I shall have to pay as much money to be raised in taxes as most of the men in the United States will have to pay, and I am ready to do it to the extent of every dollar that I own. [Applause.]

I have no doubt of that statement. That moment in a burst of patriotism the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] obligated himself, and I have no doubt he meant it. He was willing then to bind himself to pay every dollar that he had, undoubtedly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. May I have about 10 minutes more?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield 10 minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman undoubtedly would make good. I regret that while he spoke thus in his individual capacity and bound himself under that sacred promise to pay, he spoke to-day in a representative capacity. I want to appeal from MADDEN, Representative, to MADDEN, individual, and ask him to hold up the same standard of patriotism, liberality, and generosity upon the part of his constituents that we know he would live up to himself. [Applause.] Again, I read from the same speech—

Most of the men who are not so fortunate will not have to pay the taxes, because the revenue that is raised now is raised by the income tax, and the men that have not the money, and the men who are not earning it, are exempt from taxation. The men who have the money ought to pay, and they are willing to pay. [Applause.]

And that brought a storm of applause, as it should have done. And he said:

If the men who have not the money, and who are able to fight, are willing to fight and offer their lives for the preservation of American honor and for the liberty of the world, then the men who are not able to fight, but who have had the good fortune to make money ought to help to pay the bill.

That was good doctrine then; it is good doctrine now. We must remember that issuing bonds pays no debts. It would have the effect of the present generation going security for the payment that was being saddled upon those who later would have to pay. I think it a matter of good faith to the soldiers that it should go out to them that we who remain at home will pay with full and round measure during the years of the war one-half of its expense.

One other matter I desire to refer to and then I have done. That is the feature of this legislation referred to by my friend from Missouri—the import-duty feature. It was very interesting. The gathering together of the large amount of money from various sources and building it into a sort of legislative pyramid worked well when we began. As we climbed along higher up we seemed to get along very well; but like building any other edifice, the farther you got up the harder it was to bring the material there. So there came a time when we had something over $1,500,000,000 and could go no farther. Then there were those who insisted upon bonds. But while there was no party division, and this was not along party lines at all, it was very interesting. It occurred something like this: There were a lot of us who wanted to follow the Constitution. We wanted to resort to the time-honored constitutional way of raising revenue; that is, at the ports. There were those who, on the other hand, wanted to avoid following their own platform—a tariff for revenue. There the contest waged. The result was we compromised by following the Constitution. We provided for raising all the way from $200,000,000 to $250,000,000 at the gates, as free-trade England had raised its last fiscal year $352,000,000 at her ports and as our neighbor, Canada, had raised $134,000,000 at her ports, that being 57 per cent of all her revenues. So we present you a tariff bill. It is not a scientific tariff measure. It is not as protective as I would like to see it. But the revenue feature is there. I think it was fitting and proper that when we approached the summit section of that great legislative pyramid, to provide it we should place a tariff provision there. It was well said by the chairman of the committee [Mr. KITCHIN] that on the summit of that bill we planted Old Glory. It seems fitting and proper that as a part of the greatest revenue bill ever presented in the United States or the world the crowning section is a protective tariff, and further that Old Glory is planted there by the gentleman from North Carolina. It is certainly a spectacle for the joy of the gods and the delight of all men. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back whatever time I may have left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back five minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, when I voted against war I voted against high taxes and conscription and big bond issues. Having done so once, I feel at liberty now to occasionally support some things I do not entirely approve, if it becomes necessary. The first duty we have at this moment is to prepare this country to support the man that goes to the firing line. Doing that we will necessarily be compelled to vote for many appropriations and laws, for many orders, that do not appeal to us as being very satisfactory or such as we would ordinarily support in ordinary, common times. I am rather inclined to believe that this bill is of that nature. None of the gentlemen who bring it into this House seem to be entirely satisfied with it. After careful examination of its provisions, I think as little of it as they do. Judging from what they say, it is about the worst bill that was ever introduced into the Congress of the United States, and the only reason they bring it here is because they simply must have the money. "A poor thing, but mine own," says the committee. One can see how it might be better and hardly how it could be worse, but it will, it appears, bring the money, and it is possible I may, as many others, vote for it as they voted heretofore for things they did not like, if a few amendments are made. However, the Constitution says this is a deliberative body, and it is our business and our duty here to discuss these measures and to make such suggestions as come to us individually, and to endeavor, if possible, to eradicate the evils and get the best results.

I notice that my predecessor a moment ago referred to the gentleman from Illinois and his recent statement (speaking for the custodians of wealth) that "the wealth of this country will support the soldiers of this country." I wish to say that is a contract, because I went over to the gentleman from Illinois after he so stated and accepted his proposition on behalf of the people who do not have the money.

You promised when you conscripted the youth of this country that you would conscript the wealth of this country. The principal criticism of this bill is that it does not do that, so far as I can see. I have gone over the bill with such care as I could give it, and I find that two-thirds of all the money to be secured by this bill is to be paid by the people without wealth in this country, by the people who fight the battles of this country. We were told on the floor that one-half of 1 per cent of the people of this country paid the income tax of this country; that only one-half of 1 per cent of the people of this country had incomes above $3,000 and $4,000. We have frequently been told that 2 per cent of the people of this country have 65 per cent of the wealth of this country. Gentlemen, if the men without that wealth are to fight the battles of this country, I think the men with that wealth should pay the debts of this country. Let their dollars die for their country, too. I think that this tax should be so arranged as to touch the large incomes in a way that would make that the real fact.

The distinguished chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], said perhaps they would have done that, but they feared if they taxed the great incomes at any higher rate they would fly into that city of refuge you provided here before you did anything else, the $5,000,000,000 bond issue, and would escape taxation of this kind. I would like to make a suggestion that may be practicable and tangible. Suppose you have a man having a large income, and you are taxing it. You could, I believe, make a statute here which would provide that if he sought a way to bring that income to a nontaxable status you could reach him in doing so. If he wanted to take $50,000,000 out of a property from which you are securing an income by taxation and transfer it to nontaxable investment, you could charge him 5 or 10 or 20 per cent as a transfer tax, like an inheritance tax.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Suppose the wealthy gentleman buys a great quantity of war bonds at 3½ per cent?

Mr. LITTLE. That is what I am talking about. You get the idea. [Laughter.] A transfer tax of such a nature would conserve our resources for taxing purposes. I think we can get by it, I will say to the distinguished committee that brought that bill in here and got by with it, so far at least. We can reach and avoid the difficulty in taxing the great incomes suggested by the committee chairman.

Run through this bill minutely and you will find that the people who fight this war are, as I said, to pay two-thirds of the taxes that support the war. When the boy comes back on a furlough from France, and goes to the station to buy a ticket, he will pay a tax to support the war. When he gets home and takes his sweetheart to a soda fountain, he will pay a tax to support this war. When his father has an automobile and this boy takes his sweetheart out riding, he will pay a tax to support this war. If he should be injured in France, and his mother or his sister should send him something by freight or express, they would pay a tax to support this war. If his girl started to nurse the boy yonder in the valleys of France, she would have to pay a tax when she buys her ticket. When the family with a boy on the firing line turns on the electric light, lights the gas range, sends a telegram, starts the phonograph, the shadow of the taxgatherer slips a hand into their frugal and hard-earned savings. If you send this boy to Europe, take your hand out of his pocket!

Every time the man that fights this war turns around, if he is at home; every time his sweetheart turns around at home, every time that his old mother goes to town, every time his father makes a purchase, a tax is paid for war purposes; and yet we are told that men with millions upon millions, millions piled upon millions, have already paid as much as they ought.

Gentlemen, you conscripted the boy. You send him off to France. He offers everything that he has upon the altar of his country, and when he lies yonder in the Pantheon of Paris, cold and dead, where is the American millionaire who would not be proud to lay his millions beside him as an offering to his country? Who makes the real sacrifice?

Somebody said this morning that no sensible man would suggest that you should tax an income over and above $100,000 to the full limit. Years ago I served this country in the Valley of the Nile, and a man worth $40,000,000 felt it necessary to do some official business through me, and he used to tell me a good many of his troubles. He said to me one day, "Wealth is of no value after you have a sufficient and reasonable competence. With a reasonable, assured income behind it, you have got everything in the world that can do you any good, and all beyond that is simply a burden and a care." He said a man with an income of $100,000 a year is just as well off as a rich man. [Laughter.] After some conferences with myself I agreed with him. But since then I have always felt that any man who had attained that rounded limit had all the wealth that is necessary in this world, and there was no particular reason why any man having that income should want any more. If this man was right—and I thought he was—there would be no use that could be made of it that would be of real assistance to him.

I was glad to hear that some honorable gentlemen had come here and tried to be heard and had told the committee that they did not want anything above $100,000, that they desired a tax of 98 per cent on all incomes over $100,000; they did not want more. I am glad that we have such patriotism in this country as compels men to come here and thus offer their money. It raised my respect for the rich 100 per cent. I do not know why the committee did not accept it. We have $225,000,000 put upon electric lights and the like. We had $426,000,000 put upon liquor, $60,000,000 on dues and show tickets, $33,000,000 in petty stamp taxes, and $70,000,000 added to letter postage. Do you know that the average income in this country is less than a thousand dollars? Those are the people that are paying all these taxes—$1,900,000,000 of $3,300,000,000. This is what you require of the men whose incomes average under $1,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman object to that tax on liquor?

Mr. LITTLE. I am glad you mentioned that. It came near getting away from me. The tax on liquor is paid by the poor man. All these taxes are shifted onto him. I do not like to see my country sharing in the profits of the saloon. If we are to have war-time prohibition in this country, as in other countries; if we are to wage war against that great evil; if we are to turn the grain into an edible instead of into a drinkable; if we are to at once begin to save our grain for the hour when women call for bread; if we are to drive the bawdy house and the saloon away from the camp, as we should, there will be no liquor to assess. I think that is what ought to be, and earnestly hope it may come to pass. If we are not going to do that, then I am in favor of charging the people who use it everything that the traffic will bear. If the bill I introduced April 5 becomes a law, there will be no drunken soldiers and no liquor to tax. I think that answers the gentleman from New York. He can take his choice either way. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Harkness died in California last year. If this tax which we now propose to impose had been laid prior to his death, he would have paid 50 per cent of all his income, and on his death his estate would have paid to the National Government 40 per cent of the principal, and to the State of California 40 per cent more of all his principal, and all his heirs would have received 20 per cent of his estate, provided it sold for enough to pay the taxes. Is the gentleman satisfied?

Mr. LITTLE. I would say to the gentleman from Connecticut that I went to the State of California in 1898 with 14,000 other men that left a thousand dead in California and across the sea. What did that millionaire's heirs lose as compared with those who loved my comrades? [Applause.] In the great game of war, gentlemen, you cast the dice and accept the fortunes of war. Lives and millions go out with the tide—but is there any here that will dare weigh them in the same scales?

> Shorten my days thou canst with sullen sorrow,
> And take nights from me, but not lend a morrow.
> Thou canst help time to furrow me with age,
> But not stop one wrinkle of his pilgrimage.
> Thy word is current with him for my death;
> But, dead, thy kingdom can not buy my breath!

What has the millionaire to lose alongside of the boy of 21 with a mother to kiss him good-by and a sweetheart to greet him home? The tax the gentleman suggests would be too great, but if it was, that millionaire did not lose one-fiftieth of what my comrades lost on the battle field. The heirs to 20 per cent of such an estate would still be rich.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. HILL. I have seen thousands of them do the same thing, but the millionaire is subject to conscription and subject to the taxation of his money besides.

Mr. LITTLE. Where is he who has accumulated a million by the time he is 30? It is said that one-half of 1 per cent of the people of this country only are able to pay an income tax. Not one-half of 1 per cent of that one-half of 1 per cent will be subject to conscription. Not 2 per cent of the 2 per cent that own 65 per cent of our wealth are subject to conscription—no, gentlemen; the people who do not own the wealth of this country will fight its battles, and the people who do own the wealth should pay its debts. [Applause.] It is no more than right and fair as an adjustment.

I do not believe in being radical or in overdoing these things. Let equity prevail. One-third, one-half, two-thirds of the tax placed on the necessities and simple luxuries of average men and women should be canceled and the same amounts levied on incomes of over $100,000, and if everyone went into the Treasury of the Nation their owners should be proud they had anything their country would accept, while the unstained youth of the Republic marched with measured tread and singing lips to the rendezvous with death. I do not know of any reason why the man that has an income of above $100,000 in the clear at a time when millions are to go down into the valley of the shadow, at a time when the widow will lay her only boy on the altar of his country, when the father will send his eldest son off to the plains of Europe—I do not know why a man with over $100,000 income should want to retain a cent of it, above that, when his country needs it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] 30 minutes.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, there is something ominous about the reception of the measures proposed for the support of the war. At a time when the Government should summon the energies of an inspirited people we seem ready to daunt their resolution to take up the burden. When we should be mustering all our resources, the administration and Congress contemplate closing the doors of popular knowledge of public affairs and putting manacles upon the national industries. We have not yet acted, and I trust that we shall not so act; but the first fruits of our proposed action may be seen in the unexpected journey of the Secretary of the Treasury to secure subscriptions for the liberty loan. None of us in this House will enjoy the task of challenging the experience and judgment of a unanimous Ways and Means Committee. We are compelled to do so only by our convictions as to what the consequences of this bill will be if it becomes a law.

Members of the committee have argued in its defense that the new taxes for the most part will fall upon those able to bear them, and that, unsound as are some of the taxes proposed, certain members of the committee have assented to them under compulsion of necessity. There is no necessity now to impose taxes which unnecessarily and gratuitously will disturb the production of the country, which will bear illogically, irrationally, and unevenly upon persons and businesses which should be equally liable to taxation.

There are some of the taxes which I shall not enumerate, but which in my inexperience I can not reconcile with the sagacity of the committee. For example, duties on fertilizer, when we would increase the productivity of our soil.

Like many Members of the House, I have been puzzled, and the American public has been puzzled, by the provision for the income tax. Members of the committee have said that they did not believe in a retroactive income tax, but one member of the committee has just explained to me in the cloakroom that if the tax be retroactive in form it is not in fact. But I am not clear why, in seeking an additional $100,000,000, it would not have been possible to add that sum, or 20 per cent, to the income taxes proposed for next year. I am not clear, and I would like to know why the rate—mark you—the rate of graduation is steeper on the smaller incomes than it is on the larger incomes. If it provide for the increase of about 10 per cent in the rate on incomes of $100,000 a year over those of $10,000 a year, what logic is there in increasing by less than 10 per cent the tax on incomes of $10,000,000 a year over those of $1,000,000 a year?

Under the provisions of the bill as they stand the exemption for married persons is lowered from $4,000 to $2,000 a year. I will not differ with the gentlemen who have proposed that provision, but I submit, Mr. Chairman, that when the exemption is fixed at $2,000 a year the committee should have provided for an additional exemption on account of children. I submit that the contemplated tax will not bear equitably upon childless couples and men and women who have families of children to support.

As I have suggested, we do not challenge the statement that a greater part of the burden will fall upon the rich and well to do, but we do charge that it will fall unequally upon those who should and must bear it.

I wish I might persuade myself that there is wisdom in the argument that the existence of the machinery for the collection of excess-profits tax justifies its oppressive and inequitable features. There are in a prosperous little city in Illinois three mercantile establishments of like size. Two of them belong to individuals who will be exempt from the excess-profit tax. The third, built up by the father, so I understand, is incorporated in order that his two sons may share in the business. It is a corporation and therefore, if the bill as it stands becomes a law, must pay 16 per cent upon its profits over 8 per cent earned on the small capital of the business.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman pardon me?

Mr. McCORMICK. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HILL. The income tax laid under this bill is additional to the present tax. As a matter of fact, the income tax on large incomes will be about 50 per cent, which is very much higher than is charged in England to-day, notwithstanding they have been three years in the war.

Mr. McCORMICK. If the gentleman will permit me to correct him, there are incomes in England which pay 60 per cent.

Mr. HILL. That is out of war profits. There the rate is 60 per cent, but on pesonal incomes the rate is nowhere near as high as the rate fixed in this bill.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. In the operation of the excess-profit tax has the gentleman considered that the profits of the individual are subject to the tax and the surtax under the income-tax law, while the profits of the corporation are not subject to the income tax until after the excess-profit tax is taken out?

Mr. McCORMICK. Precisely; and that illustrates the gross injustice of the excess-profits tax.

Mr. ELSTON. Has the gentleman figured the compensation—the difference between the two burdens—and whether or not it is not equalized somewhat?

Mr. McCORMICK. An individual whose income is drawn from stocks in several companies will pay through the companies the excess-profits tax. And, then, if his income in the aggregate amounts to enough he will be liable to the surtax.

Mr. ELSTON. It is my recollection that the dividends from corporation stocks are excepted from the income tax altogether.

Mr. HILL. Oh, no.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. I would be glad if the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] would give me sometime the information he suggested. I went through the library information yesterday——

Mr. McCORMICK. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I should be very grateful to the gentleman if he would ask for private information in some other time than mine.

Mr. LITTLE. I hate to interrupt the gentleman; but I did not want that fact to get away. I just wanted to say that was not the information that I got in the library yesterday.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman should get his information in some other time than mine.

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, I shall not interrupt the gentleman again. He will be here for two years and I shall not interrupt him again.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, the bill would carry into almost every community in the United States the injustice of the excess-profits tax exemplified in that little city in Illinois. It is not an excess-profits tax in the original popular understanding of the term and bears no relation to excess profits solely due to war. For example, last week I was advised that the representative of a group of great New York business men expressed himself as being in favor of the proposed increase in the excess-profits tax. It would be easier, so I conceive, for the owner of "war brides" or "war babies" earning 500 per cent to pay an excess-profits tax than to pay an income tax graduated in fair consideration of the great incomes.

There is a vast difference between the excess-profits tax, so called, in this country and that which obtains in Great Britain. In broad terms the British excess-profits tax has amounted to 60 per cent of all traders' profits which are in excess by more than $1,000 of the average of any two out of three years preceding the outbreak of the war. The books of an industry in Great Britain are examined to determine what was the average of profit prior to the war, and taxation is then based upon the increment and profit due to the war. That is a sound and just tax, as ours is unsound and unjust.

Yesterday I met, quite by accident, certain gentlemen interested in the publication of agricultural weeklies and periodicals. Parenthetically perhaps I ought to say that not one of the great newspapers published in Chicago has suggested to me either that it would suffer by reason of the proposed zone rate or that if it would suffer it objected to the imposition of the zone rate. My correspondence indicates that the full burden of the proposed rate will fall upon the smaller newspapers and upon the periodicals. But, to revert to the gentlemen whom I met yesterday, they permitted me to copy some rather interesting tables prepared by the accounting firm of Price, Waterhouse & Co. relative to the profits of periodicals and the effect upon them of the increase in the cost of paper and the increase of the postal charges contemplated in this bill. The income of 55 farm papers amounted last year to $581,875. The increase in the postal charges, if they are not compelled to abandon publication, or if they do not ship by express rather than through the mails, will amount to some $1,823,000. The increase in the cost of paper at present prices over last year will amount to some $1,107,000. That means that the increased burden upon them from these two causes will aggregate nearly $3,000,000, or an increase over their combined net income of $2,348,000. These gentlemen also permitted me to take a copy of another statement prepared by Price, Waterhouse & Co. covering the business of 88 publications of a general character, including all those, save one or two, next in importance to the Curtis publications, to which reference has been made ever since the question of the increase in postal rates was mooted in 1910 or 1911. Their aggregate net income was $1,154,654.14.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As to the second-class postal rates in which the gentleman is interested and about which he knows a great deal——

Mr. McCORMICK. I know relatively little.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is associated indirectly at least with the newspaper fraternity, as I have been. I would like to know what remedy the gentleman has to suggest for the existing condition. The Curtis Publishing Co. is in my district. It is a wonderful establishment and ought to be encouraged. How are we going to meet the question of fair play to them and at the same time do justice by the Government?

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman permit me to conclude these figures?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon; I thought that perhaps the gentleman had some remedy in mind.

Mr. McCORMICK. I shall offer one tentatively in a moment. I will ask the gentleman to let me conclude these figures, as they are somewhat interesting. The increase in the cost of postage and paper over the combined net profits of these eighty-eight periodicals would amount to some $6,575,000 over income. The net income of the Curtis publications, so I am advised, is not less than twice as large as the aggregate net income of these eighty-eight other publications next in importance. I do not know whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania remembers that seven years ago, when I was still the publisher of a newspaper, I advocated the imposition of zone rates. The difficulty with these proposed rates is that they have very little relation to the present ability of publications to bear them. Indeed, I understand that the Postmaster General, who always has supported the principle of zone rates, takes the ground that his business in the carrying of second-class matter would be so gravely injured by these rates that he opposes their imposition. If they did not ruin publications they would drive them to ship through the express companies. It may be that upon due consideration, as some gentleman has suggested to the committee, the Post Office Committee may be able to devise a system of charges which will bear a relation to the ability of the publications to meet the charges, and it may be that they can devise a system of taxation which will bear a relation to the income of publications as well as to the volume of mail of second-class matter which they offer the Government for shipment. I assume, of course, that the Curtis publications would be liable to the proposed excess profits and income taxes, but nevertheless I am told that they alone among these more important periodicals can meet the proposed rate and still find a profit for their owner.

Before I conclude I wish to invite the consideration of the committee to two statements which have been made before the committee and which seem to me entitled to more consideration than has been given to them. One is the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], which I have not heard challenged, that the estimate for expenditures is some $600,000,000 or $700,000,000 less than the revenues which it is contemplated to raise under the bill.

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman will pardon me, he does not say the estimate of expenditures; he says the appropriations which have been made. But when you recognize the fact that appropriations have been made to cover only a portion of the year and that the tax is laid to cover the whole year, is where the difference between Mr. MADDEN on this bill lies.

Mr. McCORMICK. The other statement was by the gentleman from Michigan, the very able ranking member of the committee, that the bill would raise from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000 more than the estimates submitted to the committee. It is the general understanding, and doubtless the justified understanding, that it is the administration's purpose to defray half the cost of the war through the issue of bonds and half through the revenue to be derived by special taxation. In Germany 10 per cent of the cost of the war has been raised by taxation. In France, 18 per cent; in Great Britain, in spite of the fact that she has carried a great part of the financial burden for her allies, only 26 per cent has been raised by taxation. Certainly none of those countries may anticipate any increment of developed national wealth comparable with the certain increment of developed wealth in this coutnry. Posterity yonder will be far less able to bear its portionate cost of the war than will our posterity here. We are engaged in a conflict, not primarily for our immediate protection, but for the protection of the country long after we are gone, I submit to the committee that it is gravely doubtful if it be wise to impose so heavy a burden of taxation upon the country at this time. I know it has been said that we should proceed with dispatch and vote upon this bill that it may become the law. Gentlemen, the present market, such as it is, for the liberty bonds indicates to me that it is far more important to proceed with care and act with wisdom than to act with foolhardy courage and haste. [Applause.] There will be nothing more difficult to do, no more important task will devolve upon us than to lay a sound foundation for the support of our armies this year, next year, and for a third year, if need be, when the burden will become too great for the countries allied with us. I have not heard a word of stubborn protest against the intention of Congress to raise great sums by revenue, even from the lips of men who think it unwise to raise so large a proportion of the cost of war from taxes. But there is not one of us who has not heard from men whose judgment is to be respected, that it is all important that these taxes shall be sound and equitably laid upon all those who are able and who ought to bear the vastly greater part of the war's cost. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER].

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman in line with what has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], I wish to place before the committee at this time a concrete illustration as to how this zone system is going to affect some of our metropolitan papers. Let us not lose sight of this one thing: When we are discussing the welfare of our great daily papers let us remember that they are the daily feeders of 100,000,000 of people with the news of the world. The little county paper does its bit; our magazines have their place; but it is only through this great medium of information that it is possible for us to carry on a national informational program. Now, I am going to give you a few figures which have been compiled by the representatives of three of the largest papers of the city of St. Louis to let you see just how this thing will work out in affecting papers going into different zones of circulation. This new burden that will be placed upon the papers should the zone system as it is now proposed become the law will make an increase to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of $200,000 per year. It will effect an increase to the St. Louis Republic of $175,000 per annum, and it will effect an increase to the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of $86,000 per annum in its expenses. That means that the Globe-Democrat will bear a burden of $114,000 annually more than the Post-Dispatch bears, and that the St. Louis Republic will bear an increase of $89,000 more than the Post-Dispatch. But here is the thing I want you to note: The daily circulation of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch is 34,000 more than the Globe-Democrat, although the Globe-Democrat will carry $114,000 heavier expenses. The daily circulation of the Post-Dispatch is 68,000 more than the Republic, although the Republic will carry $89,000 heavier burden. The Sunday circulation of the Post-Dispatch is 73,000 more than the circulation of the Globe-Democrat, and the Sunday circulation of the Post-Dispatch is 130,000 more than the Sunday circulation of the Republic.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any figures to give the committee as to whether this additional expense is occasioned by the increase of rates on the first zone or merely was occasioned by doubling the rates of the first zone?

Mr. MEEKER. I have not that exact information except this, that the Post-Dispatch is an afternoon paper. It sells within the immediate vicinity of St. Louis. The Globe-Democrat and the Republic have a very large country circulation. Take the papers of the Northwest, for instance, papers from Milwaukee or from Duluth and Minneapolis. Think how sparsely settled is that great northwest country and what a struggle there has been to put those papers, those mediums of circulation onto their feet. They are going to find this burden such as would wipe them out of existence is my judgment. Now, there is another thing we have to keep in mind. Suppose you are in Kansas City or in Washington or in any other community and you desire to find out what conditions are in St. Louis? The St. Louis publisher with his daily paper finds himself in competition with the Kansas City publisher on the streets at a disadvantage of possibly 6 or 8 cents a paper. It means the destruction of what you might call the national circulation of our dailies. It will practically be impossible, and the thing that will occur with these papers cutting down the territory they reach will be that their advertising rates will be worth less. I believe that the newspaper men themselves would rather that the Government would step in and take everything out of their treasury except what it costs to run the paper and pay for their help than they would to have it tax them in such a way as to destroy their business. That is the thing we want to get at. We are not differing here over the money that is to be gotten, but we should not adopt a system whereby we will destroy the very organization that is to yield a revenue.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is making rather of a startling statement. Can he give us the circulation of any one of these papers?

Mr. MEEKER. I gave them all.

Mr. MANN. You did not give them.

Mr. MEEKER. The Post-Dispatch is 170,000 daily; the Globe-Democrat, 136,000; the Post-Dispatch, Sunday, is 230,000; the Globe-Democrat, Sunday, is 163,000; the Republic, daily, is 102,000, and Sunday is 106,000.

I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thank him for calling my attention to it.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. Can the gentleman give us any information as to the percentage of circulation that goes through the mails and the percentage that is given out by carriers?

Mr. MEEKER. I can not.

Mr. RUBEY. Does not the gentleman think that 95 per cent, as much as that, of the circulation of these papers is through carriers and does not go through the post office?

Mr. MEEKER. Oh, no; not that percentage. The Globe-Democrat has a very large circulation of its semiweekly number.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman tell the committee what per cent of all these papers in the city of St. Louis, that he enumerates, use the express companies to forward their papers?

Mr. MEEKER. I can not. But under this bill as submitted by the committee the express will not give them any relief, because wherever they send the paper by express the rate is to be the same as if they mailed it the whole distance, and 10 per cent express in addition.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The newspapers only send their publications by express when they are sent to be distributed by other agencies than the post; that is, for instance, the news dealers in other cities. There are rarely newspapers sent by express there, later to be deposited in the mail for local delivery.

Mr. MEEKER. The Sunday edition, much of it, I think, is carried by the express. I will say to the gentleman, however, I will endeavor to obtain the facts as to what the percentage distributed by carriers is and the percentage carried by mail. These figures which are here submitted I have obtained from the representatives of the three newspapers, who at this time have stated just what conditions are. I simply lay them before the committee, so that we will see how it is with a great metropolitan paper, like in the cities of New York or Chicago, that may have a large circulation in the immediate vicinity. The minute they strike the mail service a large addition to the cost is going to weigh heavily on them if they have a small city circulation but a large rural circulation.

Mr. MANN. Somebody must have figured on this. Is the gentleman able to give the circulation of these papers that go by mail and the different zones to which they go?

Mr. MEEKER. I can not. I have not obtained that yet.

Mr. MANN. How is it possible to arrive at a total without doing that?

Mr. MEEKER. I simply have the sum total of the figures, but I have not divided them up.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman gets his sum total from a statement made by somebody else?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Somebody must have figured it out to get it. I do not think it is possible that those figures are accurate. However, they may be.

Mr. MEEKER. I make the statement on the basis of what was shown by the representatives of the three St. Louis papers—the Globe, the Republic, and the Post-Dispatch—who held a conference and prepared these figures. I will be glad to verify them further for the information of the gentleman.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to give the gentleman some of the figures called for by the gentleman from Illinois, of what is a typical Northwestern paper, the Omaha Bee. The statement from the editor is as follows:

Omaha Bee is in round numbers 56,500, of which 34,500 go through mails; none by express. Mail subscribers in first and second zones, 25,200. Mail subscribers in third zone, 5,800. Mail subscribers in fourth zone, 3,500.

I think probably that is the situation as to the papers of the Northwest, and probably throughout the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. IGOE rose.

Mr. MEEKER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. IGOE. I was going to suggest that the condition of apparent inequality between the Post-Dispatch and the other two papers is due to the fact that the circulation of the Post-Dispatch is almost entirely local, and that the effect of the increase of the rates upon these other two papers will be simply that they will either have to charge a higher rate for the papers which circulate in the country or discontinue that circulation.

Mr. MEEKER. That is the point I think we should bring out.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the principal thing that will be done will be this, that in the outer zones, where the rate is high, it will destroy the circulation of the paper altogether. It would reduce the circulation by that much; reduce the income by the reduction of the circulation, and reduce the value of the advertising space in the paper besides, and therefore reduce the revenue to the paper.

Mr. MEEKER. Yes; that is the point I touched on a moment ago.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In Ayer's Newspaper Annual the St. Louis Globe-Democrat is given last year a morning circulation of 151,000, a Sunday circulation of 175,000, and a semi-weekly circulation of 85,000 copies, sold at 50 cents a year. That paper circulates largely in the Southwest, including the State of Texas.

Mr. MEEKER. Yes. I believe that the committee should bear in mind that in our desire—pardon me; I was going to say in our haste—sufficient time should be given for the consideration of this subject. Inasmuch as we are dealing with a proposition that involves billions of dollars we should take sufficient time. I do not believe it would be a crime to spend 24 hours more on it to think it over. If we were only appropriating several hundred thousand dollars we might take only an hour; but here is a proposition to bring the largest return to the Government and at the same time to safeguard to the fullest possible extent the institutions that are to produce this revenue. Do not let the suggestion go out from here that whatever tax we are going to lay is to be a menace to the industry upon which it is laid. The business world should feel that while this revenue is to come, it is to come out of what they are able to produce and that it will not approach them in such a way as to destroy their efficiency and make it impossible for them to live.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. REED. There has been a great deal of emphasis laid on the fact that the Government is losing so many cents a pound on second-class matter and gaining about 32 cents a pound on the first-class matter, and by that the loss is made up.

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. REED. Can the gentleman inform the committee what the loss would be to the Government when the second-class publication circulation is destroyed? Because every advertiser is keyed to know how many replies he gets in the post office. As the advertisers write in they want to know how many letters they got through Collier's, for instance. How much business will the Government lose when now it is making a fine profit?

Mr. MEEKER. I could not answer that because I am not a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, where this question should have gone, instead of being considered by the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. COX. Our Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads recommended a small increase of postage a few years ago in one of the post-office appropriation bills, and when the reading clerk reached that item not less than 50 Members were on their feet seeking to make a point of order against the item.

Mr. MEEKER. That was under the zone system?

Mr. COX. Yes; it involved a much smaller increase than this.

Mr. MEEKER. I think the establishment of a zone system for national service, in the way of disseminating information or anything of that sort, is a wrong system.

Mr. COX. Would the gentleman agree to the amount recommended by Mr. Justice Hughes?

Mr. MEEKER. What was that? How much?

Mr. COX. A flat rate of 1 cent increase.

Mr. MEEKER. I think that would be equitable, to say the least.

Mr. COX. Our committee held hearings in 1914 on the subject for I do not know just how long. I think it was about two weeks. During the continuance of those hearings newspaper representatives from all over the country appeared before our committee when we were trying to enforce the provisions of the Hughes Commission, and they complained vehemently that even that 1 cent a pound extra would put them out of business.

Mr. MEEKER. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. COX. Those hearings may be found in our committee. They are very interesting.

Mr. MEEKER. I think the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads indicated this afternoon, although I was not on the floor at the time, that an amendment was to be offered that will later on be voted upon. I think the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads should be consulted. I believe that we should take into consideration not only the newspaper men but we should remember that when we are dealing with the newspaper business we are dealing with the only world-wide source of information. [Applause.] When we are talking about taxing this industry let us see to it that we do not in any way limit its usefulness. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that it is necessary for any Member of this House who does not agree with any proposed bill to apologize. I want to make it clear that I am not taking part in the confetti throwing and the flower showering that has been indulged in by the gentlemen of the committee. I can not for the life of me understand how 23 men can agree on a bill of such vast importance. [Laughter.] I do not say that there should be differences on party lines, but if it had been thoroughly studied and true deliberation given there would have been differences of opinion on economic principles—such difference of opinion would have been productive of wholesome debate rather than a carnival of praise.

A great deal has been said about harmony and about sectionalism. I, coming from the State of New York, which State will pay about one-third of these taxes, am not afraid to say that I shall argue on the question of sectionalism. It is real nice for gentlemen to say, "We are partners now, and we will each bear our share." We are partners, but a few Northern States are furnishing the fodder and feeding the cow, and the South is doing the milking.

Now, you say that this bill is equitable. You say that you want to tax every man; and you start taxing a man with an income of a thousand dollars. Without any tax being imposed on his income, the man earning a thousand dollars a year is paying a greater proportion of these taxes than the man who is earning $5,000 a year. You tax his coffee, you tax his tea, you tax his soap, you tax his light, you tax his heat, you tax his insurance, you tax his amusements, and you tax his beer or his soda, and even the chewing gum for his children, and the proportion those necessaries bear to his income is greater than that in the case of a man who is earning $5,000 a year; so much so that he is already paying more than his share. Income should not be taxed as low as $1,000. It should be left exactly where it is if you are going to levy the other taxes proposed in this bill. Then you say you are going to tax coffee and tea. You are going to tax the breakfast table. If necessary, do it; tax coffee; but why do you not also tax Postum and other substitutes for coffee? "Is there a reason?"

We tax substitutes for wine. Let us tax every substitute for coffee and tea. I am going to introduce such an amendment. I wish some Member of the committee would do it and then there might be some chance of putting it through.

Now, a great deal has been said about the 10 per cent ad valorem duty on all imports. I can not see anything scientific in shutting your eyes and saying 10 per cent on everything that is imported. There are raw materials, fertilizers, and a good many other articles that we absolutely need in our industries. To do so is ruinous, but quite in keeping with the logic of the bill. Everybody who has spoken against the bill said that they were going to vote for it. I am frank to say that unless it is so changed that it will not be recognized by the distinguished gentlemen who boast of its paternity I shall vote against it. It is true we must raise $1,800,000,000, but I believe that that can be done in a scientific, equitable, and just manner.

Why, this zone system? The second-class mail is an American institution. It has done more to spread education, knowledge, and entertainment throughout this country than anything else. It has made this vast country a unit. You are going to tax the very existence of an important industry, and you must take into consideration what that will mean. There are thousands and thousands of men in my city that will be thrown out of employment, and what some of you gentlemen will do in your section of the country for information and knowledge I do not know. [Laughter and applause.]

I do not see why the committee did not include a tax on bank checks. If a proper and equitable tax on checks were imposed, we might be able to do away with the change in the postal rates. No matter, gentlemen, what change is proposed in the postal rates, no matter how just it may be, you ought not to put such a law into effect for less than one year after its enactment.

You intend taxing light and heat if furnished by a public service corporation. This hits every resident of New York City. If city people when they go home in the evening and light the gas or turn on the electricity, will pay toward the expense of the war, well and good; but they have a right to tell you that their countrymen throughout the Nation ought to be taxed likewise, whether they burn petroleum or anything else. [Applause.]

I hope the committee will take that into consideration. I do not think it is just where one State of the Union is picked out to bear all the burdens. New York will furnish the greater number of men, the greater number of officers, regardless of the population, and now it is a huge joke to spread the burden of taxation upon it. You men are throwing bouquets at each other, but you do not play fair, because the bill is not fair, just, or patriotic. I wonder if the river and harbor bill is going to be likewise. I believe the best thing this House can do is to vote to recommit this bill to the committee. Let them start anew, let them spend some time on it, and come back with a bill which will provide the necessary revenue and which will distribute the burden throughout the country equally. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I was promised 30 minutes. I want to discuss this question of postal rates, which I fondly believed would be so interesting that it would attract a very large attendance in this House. I am delighted to see my expectations have not been disappointed.

I said I thought it would interest the House, because there have been so many statements made here that were startling if true, made by gentlemen who undoubtedly believed they were true but who were greatly mistaken.

The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, for instance, made the statement that the loss to the United States Government upon second-class mail matter was $92,000,000. He was followed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], who in his most unctious style described this as the most hateful graft, and it amounted to $80,000,000 a year.

They get this statement from the calculations made on what? They get it from the report of the Postmaster General in 1909 and the figures submitted by the Hughes Commission. What were those figures based upon? They were based on actual investigations made on the ground, and a count of the pieces, and the stamps, and it was a very thorough investigation of what the second-class mail matter cost at that time. They took the total expense of the Postal Service, divided it among the different classes of mail, and arrived at the particular pound cost of each class of mail matter. They found, for instance, that the cost of second class was 9.23 cents. The publishers paid 1 cent and the Government lost 8.23 cents a pound. At that time the volume of the second-class mail was 700,000,000 pounds. It is now 1,200,000,000 pounds, according to the last report. The way they figured it out it cost 9 and a fraction cents, or a loss of 8 cents, and over, a pound. Twelve hundred million pounds, at 9 cents, makes $108,000,000—less $12,000,000, 1 cent per pound paid—leaves $96,000,000 loss. That, of course, would be correct if the cost given is correct. It is based, as I said, upon facts and data collected in 1907—10 years ago. If the cost of transporting and handling the mail has decreased per pound in the last 10 years, manifestly the conclusions are correspondingly wrong. The volume of mail has increased more than 300 per cent in those years, and the cost per pound has been reduced by about one-half.

What do these gentlemen contend? Has the cost of performing the mail service been stationary in 10 years? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], who is so absorbed with his love of books that he deprecates every periodical publication, and who read some sentimental extracts from publications in Maine, has neglected to keep up with the times. If he kept up with the times he would know that there has been great economies in handling and transporting mail since 1907, when these figures upon which he based his conclusions were made. What do you suppose they gave as the cost of transporting and handling fourth-class mail? Why, 12 cents per pound! Last year we transported over 1,000,000,000 pieces, weighing 2,000,000,000 pounds. At 12 cents per pound this would cost $240,000,000, while the postage collected was only slightly over 3 cents per pound, or $60,000,000. According to latest figures, we are now carrying 2,114,000,000 pounds per annum. The last three years we have collected in postage, on the average, 3¼ cents per pound on parcel post, and the cost, according to the department, has been less than 3 cents per pound. Now, will some one tell me how they can carry parcel post less than 3 cents per pound if it costs over 9 cents for second-class matter? The cost of transportation is precisely the same for both classes and the difference in cost of handling can not possibly be more than a cent or two per pound.

The Hughes Commission, upon the evidence submitted, found that the cost of handling and transporting second-class mail in 1908 was 5½ cents per pound. (See p. 127 of Hughes Commission Report.) In other words, they cut down the claim of the department from 9.23 cents per pound to 5.5 cents. Still the department has kept on repeating that it costs over 9 cents per pound. But let us remember that the Hughes Commission based its finding on the figures for 1907 and 1908, since which time the reduction in the cost of handling and transporting the mails have been gradually reduced as the volume has increased.

This can easily be demonstrated. If, for instance, we calculate the cost for last year by applying the rates per pound given as the cost in the Postmaster General's report for 1908, we find that it amounts to more than twice what we actually paid last year The old figures were: For first-class mail, 50 cents; second class, 9 cents; third class, 14 cents; fourth class, 12 cents; franked matter, 11 cents; penalty-envelope mail, 12 cents; foreign mail, 11 cents per pound.

The first-class mail then was 157,000,000 pounds. It is now estimated 315,000,000 pounds. They say that it costs 50 cents a pound for first-class mail. You will understand that by knowing there are 45 pieces to the pound and it costs so much for distribution. The transportation of letters is a bagatelle and the main cost is in the handling. The revenue is given as 84 cents per pound and the number of pieces to the pound 45; but the expense is within a very small fraction of 50 cents a pound. Applying these figures we find that it cost last year $157,500,000 for first-class mail. But let us take second-class mail matter. They say there were 1,200,000,000 pounds last year at 9 cents a pound. This would give us $108,000,000. Third-class mail matter would cost $50,400,000, and fourth-class mail, which last year amounted, including parcels, to 2,114,000,000 pounds, which, they said, cost 12 cents a pound, would cost $253,000,000. Franked matter, $1,000,000; penalty envelopes, which do not pay anything, which cost at the rate per pound, they said, of 12 cents, $10,000,000; and foreign mail would have cost $108,000,000. Therefore we have $687,000,000 as the expense of the Postal Service if we paid the rates that were in vogue 10 years ago. The cost of the Postal Service was only $306,000,000 last year, therefore we have done it for a great deal less than half of what it cost according to these rates. I here insert the table from which these figures are taken:

Table showing weight of mails in 1907 and at present time of the different classes and the cost of the service based on the figures, per pound, given in the table of 1907, which was used in the computations of the Postal Commission and Hughes Commission.

Class.	Weight in 1907 (pounds).	Weight at present (pounds).	Estimated cost in 1907 (rate per pound).	Cost at present, if old rate of 1907 was applied.
First	157,502,610	315,000,000	$0.50	$157,500,000
Second	792,580,967	1,200,000,000	.09	108,000,000
Third	179,694,654	360,000,000	.14	50,000,000
Fourth	58,889,400	2,114,000,000	.12	253,000,000
Franked	4,531,080	9,000,000	.11	1,000,000
Penalty	43,692,474	86,000,000	.12	10,000,000
Foreign	54,067,099	100,000,000	.11	11,000,000
Total	1,290,358,284	4,184,000,000		590,500,000

Entire cost of the Postal Service in 1916 was $306,000,000.

Entire revenue in 1916, $312,000,000. If we apply the cost rate used by department, there would be a deficit last year of $284,500,000 instead of a surplus of $6,000,000.

The Postmaster General reports that the parcel post, which weighs more than 2,000,000,000 pounds, is carried at a profit of $15,000,000. It costs 6 cents and a fraction per parcel, and there are 6 mills per pound profit. Therefore it is less than 3 cents. It is 6 cents per piece, and the average is 2 pounds to the piece, or, to be exact, 1 pound and 15 ounces. I have his letter here, which is rather old, more than a year old, but he figured it out then according to statistics gathered in 1915. The cost has been reduced since.

JANUARY 12, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM W. GRIEST,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. GRIEST: Receipt is acknowledged of your communication of December 29, 1915, relative to the Parcel Post Service, and in reply I wish to state that in order to enable the department to ascertain the growth of the service, as well as the revenues and cost, periodical counts have been made and statistics in the minutest detail compiled from the data obtained in these counts at the 50 largest post offices, which handle approximately three-fourths of the entire parcel-post business of the country. The last such count covered the period from October 1 to 15, 1915, inclusive, which is believed to be a period of the year when an average amount of mail is handled. This count showed that in the entire Postal Service during that period 40,889,595 parcels were handled, or an aggregate of 981,350,280 for one year. As the average weight of these parcels is 1 pound and 11 ounces, the total weight for the year was 1,640,943,240 pounds, and the postage, at an average rate of 6.6 cents per parcel, was $64,769,118.48.

During the hearings before the subcommittee on parcel post of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads in 1911 it was estimated by officers of the department that the average cost of handling parcels, exclusive of transportation, would be approximately 2.35 cents. It has been found, however, upon experience that this was greater than the actual cost, due no doubt to the increased number of parcels handled, the adoption of better methods, and higher efficiency of the Postal Service generally. Based upon statistics which are believed to be absolutely reliable, it would appear that the average cost of handling parcels at this time, exclusive of transportation, does not exceed 2 cents, or 1.185 cents per pound. The average distance which a pound of parcel-post matter is transported is 416 miles, and the average rate of transportation per pound for the United States is 2.08 cents, making a total cost of 3.265 cents per pound. The average postage per parcel is 6.6 cents, or 3.911 cents per pound, leaving a net profit of 6.46 mills per pound. As 1,640,943,240 pounds are handled in a year, the profit at this rate would be $10,600,493.33.

Officers of the department have made a most careful study of the entire parcel-post subject, and the statistics which have been compiled are based on records made at the time parcels were actually mailed and are believed to be absolutely reliable. It will therefore be seen that instead of a deficit in this service the revenue derived therefrom is sufficient not only to meet the cost thereof but result in considerable profit to the department.

Sincerely, yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

The cost of handling the parcel post has been reduced, so that to-day it costs for transportation and handling about 2½ or 3 cents per pound.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is the parcel post?

Mr. STEENERSON. The parcel post. Some say that the parcel post is only transported a short distance. He says in his letter that it is between four and five hundred miles, the average distance. The average distance of newspapers is only 255 miles, a great deal shorter transportation than upon parcel post. Everybody knows that catalogues travel from New York, as they say in the Post Office Department, 1,500 miles on an average, and some say 1,800 miles. If the catalogues travel that distance, then, the parcels and the parcel post sent in response to those advertisements travel that far. I think the distance the parcel post travels is very much greater. However, it can not be true that the Government lost $96,000,000 or $80,000,000 or any other like sum on second-class mail matter. It is impossible.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Did the commission find what it cost to carry second-class matter for the average distance?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; the Hughes Commission found, based on figures taken in 1907, the cost of transporting and handling second-class mail was 5½ cents, but the gentleman should know and should remember that the railway-mail pay per pound has been reduced enormously since then—nearly one-half. The reason for that is that we are still operating under the old system of weight. The space plan has not gone into effect except experimentally, and the rate for carrying the mail on the railways under that system is a sliding scale. It costs twenty times as much per pound per mile to haul mail on a road that carries 200 pounds average daily weight as it does when it carries 48,000 pounds. Therefore, when you increase the volume you automatically reduce the expense per pound, so that the inauguration of the parcel post has had the effect of reducing the rate of pay to the railways for transportation by nearly one-half in the last 10 years, and these gentlemen do not seem to know it.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman state how much the Hughes Commission found it cost?

Mr. STEENERSON. They found it cost 5½ cents per pound for railroad transportation and handling. I just stated that.

Mr. GOOD. For 250 miles?

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, no; the average weight all over. Newspapers are carried 250 miles on the average, magazines 1,000, and the average for second-class would be 400, or about that.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman says this was reduced about one-half?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes. I will prove it to the gentleman. Although there may be a lot of mail that does not go on the railways, yet for the sake of illustration I will take the 4,000,000,000 pounds of total weight of mail. How much is the railway mail pay to-day? Sixty million dollars? If it is $60,000,000, it is 1½ cents a pound on the average for railway mail transportation, and we pay them the same for hauling a brick as we do a letter. It is pound for pound. It may be that it costs more than a cent and a half on an average, because probably a considerable part of that 4,000,000,000 pounds does not reach the railroads, and yet there are 114,000,000 more than the 4,000,000,000 that I have allowed as a matter that does not reach the railroads at all. Even if there was only three billion pounds, 2 cents a pound would be $6,000,000. It is not only the automatic reduction in the railway pay, but we have reduced it by other means—we have reduced it by the divisor about 7 or 8 or 9 per cent since 1908. It took four years to put that into effect. It went into effect in one division each year. In 1907 the weight of the bags, and so forth, the equipment, as nearly half as much as the weight of the mail. The old burglar-proof leather sacks were heavy; we now use light sacks; equipment now weighs one-half less than then per pound of mail. We ship magazine mail by freight under the blue-tag system. We made other reductions since the statistics that the department submitted to the Hughes Commission were gathered. Therefore, I say that we are conservative when we say that the statements made here as to a graft of $80,000,000 or $90,000,000 are gross exaggerations, unworthy of anybody that makes the statement. [Applause.] It can not be true. What, then, does the expense of this second-class mail consist in? If on the average it costs a cent and a half for railway transportation, what is the other? It is the handling. Now, you notice that the figure of 50 cents a pound for first-class mail was fixed because there are 45 pieces to the pound. Why is it they only call it a half cent to a cent for handling parcel post? It is because there are 2 pounds to each piece and there are fewer handled. That is the reason.

Now, then, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] has argued that it was a grave injustice to take large pieces of mail. That is a mistake, because it is cheaper for the Government to handle large pieces than it is small ones. The injustice he showed was in a little slip of a paper published in Vermont or New Hampshire where 100 pieces of them went to the pound. If that is true, that is an outrage and it ought to be ruled out, and I think the department should rule it out of the second-class privilege. The expense of handling is an important item of expense and that has been reduced in the last 10 years by reason of the fact the Postmaster General has required and now requires all second-class mail to be put into—made up as they call it—bundles and addressed to the postmasters and branch post offices where they are to be taken, and so forth. There is great economy in the distribution over what it was in 1907. Otherwise you could easily see that we could not do this enormous postal business we now do and still have a surplus, as they claim, of $6,000,000, although I doubt they have any, but still it is very near self-sustaining and the volume has been increasing. Now, therefore, gentlemen, it seems to me that nothing can be gained by error. These gentlemen who have for years and years advertised to the world that the Government was being robbed out of $80,000,000 should reflect that that is unfair. It is bad enough as it is. I believe the Government does lose on second-class mail, but it does not lose anything like as much as they say.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will.

Mr. FORDNEY. Is it not true that the report of every Postmaster General in the last 10 years shows that that is about the amount lost on second-class mail matter?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; but I think, while the gentleman was out possibly, I showed by the actual figures taken of the parcel post in 1907 that they have entirely changed it and whereas they said probably truly that it cost 12 cents per pound to handle and transport, they now say it costs less than 3 cents. Both statements are correct, but we should not use the figures of 1907 in 1916 or 1917.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me finish that statement. The Postmaster General has all the information with reference to the entire working of the Postal Department under his observation, and each and every one of them makes the same statement every year. Therefore does not the gentleman think there is something in it?

Mr. STEENERSON. It is absolutely a mistake, and they ought to revise it. The cost of doing the business has been reduced.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then for 10 years everybody has made the same mistake——

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, no.

Mr. FORDNEY. And they tell us in making their report——

Mr. STEENERSON. Can not the gentleman see their mistake?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I can not see any from what the gentleman has said. The gentleman has not got the books of the post office of the whole workings of it.

Mr. STEENERSON. But I have the figures——

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman know that there is in the Treasury Department twenty to thirty million dollars which is not paid out of postal receipts that do not show on the Postmaster General's report——

Mr. STEENERSON. I criticized that recently. If the gentleman will excuse me, I am sorry that the committee have continually repeated this story, because, as I say, it is based upon figures made in 1907, which were correct at that time; they were correct, and it cost them 12 cents a pound. Does the Postmaster General claim that it costs 12 now? He certainly will not. It costs 3 cents a pound, 6 cents per piece for parcel post, and they make money at that—6 mills on the pound. The gentleman wants to put on his thinking cap and not take the authority of somebody else for it. Gentlemen, it is as plain as sunshine that when the volume of mail is 4,000,000,000 pounds, and we pay the railroads only $60,000,000, that we only pay them 1½ cents per pound on the average, and that it does not cost as much now as 10 years ago, when we paid them $50,000,000 and our whole volume of mail was only 1,200,000,000 pounds. We then paid 4½ cents per pound, while now it is certainly less than 2 cents.

Mr. FORDNEY. With all due respect to the gentleman's knowledge of affairs of the Postal Department, I have great respect for them and for his knowledge——

Mr. STEENERSON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman takes the figures and then makes up these things, does he not?

Mr. STEENERSON. I certainly do at this time, and I have shown that the price it costs to-day and what it cost 10 years ago has been reduced one-half.

Mr. FORDNEY. Why not induce the Postmaster General to do this thing right and tell him that his bookkeeping is all wrong and that his statement is all wrong?

Mr. STEENERSON. I am ready to do that. I will tell you one thing. I asked the Assistant Postmaster General at the hearings what is the total volume of mail, and he said he did not know. The only way I have arrived at these figures—and they are approximately correct—is by figuring the total postage and dividing the amount of postage paid per pound for each class of these things. I want the gentleman from Michigan to understand that the figures as to the total rate of parcel post have only recently been ascertained. They gave me a blue print, computed on weighings and countings, in October last, and you multiply that by the number of days in the year and you get the result. Those are authentic. I reduced them to a table. Here it is:

Parcel-post statistics, 1917.

Total parcels mailed	1,091,493,416
Total weight, pounds	2,114,768,481
Total postage	$71,091,241.12

The above calculations of a year's business are based on the weighing for the two-week period, October 2–16, 1916.

The average cost for clerk hire per piece for this period is one-fourth of a cent. The average postage collected on parcels for the last 3 years is 6½ cents; per pound, 3¼ cents. The average of parcels in 1913 was 1 pound and 12 ounces and in 1916 was 1 pound and 15 ounces.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What does the Postmaster General's report show the cost per pound of parcel-post mail to be?

Mr. STEENERSON. It shows a little less than 3 cents.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. I would like to have a little more time.

Mr. FORDNEY. We are trying to get through and finish to-night, but I will yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Which costs the most, to carry parcel post or the average second-class mail?

Mr. STEENERSON. There is no difference in cost of transportation. The transportation of one pound costs the same as any other pound.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then it is easily demonstrated from the report of the Postmaster General himself that this statement made here repeatedly within the last few days that it costs 8 or 9 cents to handle and carry second-class mail is not true?

Mr. STEENERSON. It is not true; but no doubt they believed it was true in 1907. They made a correct statement—or, at least, what they believed to be correct—in 1907, and have repeated it ever since, regardless of change in cost of doing postal business. It is a wonderful showing the Postmaster General has made.

Mr. COX. No Postmaster General has ever said it cost 9 cents to transport.

Mr. STEENERSON. To transport and handle.

Mr. COX. To transport and deliver is quite a different proposition.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman understands it costs more to handle the second class than parcels, because parcels go 2 pounds to the piece, whereas second class probably goes two or three pieces to the pound. In 1907 the table furnished by the department showed four pieces to the pound and a fraction over.

Now, here is another matter I want to call attention to: The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] spoke about the Bible being shipped as books and that it cost 8 cents a pound to ship it to California. Do you know that up to the present administration catalogue houses shipped their catalogues as books? They shipped them as books and paid a flat rate of 8 cents a pound. The Sears, Roebuck catalogue and many others weigh 5 pounds apiece. Therefore, they paid 40 cents.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How do they get that rate?

Mr. STEENERSON. They shipped them as books formerly. Wait a minute now. They used to pay 40 cents for each catalogue to get it to the farmer's house. On December 6, 1914, Mr. Burleson issued an order, which I will print in the RECORD, taking effect March 16, 1914, taking books out of the third-class rate under the general authority there is in the parcel-post law and placing them as parcel post. Now, what difference does that make? Talk about graft! The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] said there was not any except in the publishing business, mostly over in Maine.

ORDER OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, December 6, 1913.

(Order No. 7705.)

On and after March 16, 1914, the classification of articles mailable under section 8 of the act of August 24, 1912 authorizing the establishment of the Parcel Post Service, shall be extended so as to include books. The rate of postage on books weighing 8 ounces or less shall be

1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof, and on those weighing in excess of 8 ounces the regular zone rate shall apply.

All regulations or parts of regulations in conflict therewith are hereby rescinded.

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Sears, Roebuck, & Co., according to the Post Office Department's information, given to me, sent out from 5,000,000 to 6,000,000 catalogues, on which they paid 40 cents apiece, or $2,400,000 a year. That was only one concern. The postage on catalogues, big and little, that were shipped as third-class matter, amounted to $10,000,000 at least. What was the result of the order that Mr. Burleson gave? Sears-Roebuck took the catalogues out of the mail and shipped them by freight to the principal cities. Baltimore gets them here in this zone, and they ship them 150 miles, 5 cents for the first pound and 1 cent for the next. We ship freight from Minneapolis to New York at 25 cents a hundred, a quarter of a cent a pound. They ship these catalogues for less than a cent per pound. Therefore, upon every catalogue that Sears-Roebuck and these other big mail-order houses ship, they save 25 cents. There is a pretty good graft. Why do they not do that with the Bible, which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] mentioned? Because the demand for Bibles on the Pacific coast does not justify them shipping in carload lots. [Laughter.] If they should ship them in carload lots, they could easily ship for about 1 or 2 cents a pound to the Pacific coast, and then you could distribute them by parcel post at this low rate. The demand for Bibles over there is not great enough, however.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How does the gentleman know we do not receive them by freight?

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, I do not think you do. I am speaking practically. This is no joke. The fact is that the order issued by the department admitting catalogues, which are books, into the parcel-post rates has deprived the Government of millions of dollars. Now, the principal man in Sears, Roebuck & Co. lives in Chicago. His name is Julius Rosenwald, and I did not know what he would do when I said two years ago, in discussing the catalogue business, that if he did not pay a big sum to the Democratic campaign fund he was an ingrate. [Laughter.] He does not appear as a contributor, but he has served on one of the finance committees of the Democratic campaign, and he is a member of the National Defense League, or whatever it is. A gentleman who sat at a banquet table with him recently told me that he was so patriotic that in order to set a good example for the liberty loan Mr. Rosenwald said he was willing to take a million dollars of this liberty loan without interest for a year. [Laughter.] I should think he would after he has made over $1,500,000 a year for the last three years out of the Postal Service. Would not you? Would not you be patriotic, too? [Laughter.]

Now, I say it comes with bad grace from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] to so berate these poor little newspapers up in Maine which contain those sentimental pieces that he read. Of course, I realize that the gentleman from Illinois naturally takes umbrage at kissing. The gentleman abhorred the story about kissing. [Laughter.] He abhorred the story about the soldier. But he ought to remember that, according to Shakespeare, the life of man is divided into seven ages, and that he himself has passed the kissing age [laughter] that was referred to in that periodical from Maine:

> All the world's a stage,
> And all the men and women merely players.
> They have their exits and their entrances,
> And one man in his time plays many parts,
> His acts being seven ages. At first the infant, * * *
> Then the whining school-boy, with his satchel
> And shining morning face, creeping like snail
> Unwillingly to school. And then the lover,
> Sighing like furnace, with a woeful ballad
> Made to his mistress' eyebrow. Then a soldier,
> Full of strange oaths, and bearded like the pard,
> Jealous in honour, sudden, and quick in quarrel,
> Seeking the bubble reputation
> Even in the cannon's mouth.

But now he comes to the class that the gentleman from Illinois and myself belong to:

> And then, the justice,
> In fair round belly, with good capon lin'd,
> With eye severe, and beard of formal cut,
> Full of wise saws and modern instances;
> And so he plays his part.

[Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. I want to make an announcement. Can the gentleman give me a minute?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield a minute to the gentleman.

Mr. STEENERSON. As a remedy I am opposed to the zone system, but I have studied out a plan which I will offer, whereby you can tax the magazine a little heavily if it has a big circulation, because it is carried farther. A magazine of enormous circulation is carried thousands of miles, but the small paper is carried only a few miles, and I propose to base the rate of postage upon the size of the circulation. I have consulted the department about it. I have also tried to discriminate against the catalogue graft, which everybody knows militates against the country merchant. [Applause.] I offered an amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill putting catalogues back in the third class, and the committee reported it favorably; but it went out on a point of order made by Mr. Lewis, who no doubt acted for the Postmaster General.

Lines 16 to 19, page 52, of the bill reads as follows:

> That second-class mail matter to subscribers from an office other than that of publication shall pay the same rate as if mailed from the office at the place of publication.

Do you know what that is for? That is to prevent the Curtis Publishing Co. or the Iron Age Co. or such firms from shipping their periodicals by rail to central points and then distributing them by parcel post in the first two zones, as Sears, Roebuck do with their catalogues. Why give Julius Rosenwald the preference? You claim the Government loses on every pound they ship because they pay the railroad 4 or 5 cents per pound. Why do you insist on losing money? The truth is, the man who wrote that proviso knew better; he knew that if you got 6 cents per pound you paid less than 2 to the railroad.

I agree with him; the 6-cent rate will be profitable; and I will, when that part of the bill is reached, offer an amendment to the effect that catalogues of mail-order houses also shall be mailed from place of publication, or, if mailed elsewhere, shall pay the rate of postage from that place to destination. I do not think you should allow the mail-order house a special privilege to the loss of our revenue. Treat the magazine and the catalogue alike; make them pay full rate.

The mail-order house, through the catalogue and magazine advertisements, comes in direct competition with all our country merchants, and is entitled to no special privilege. Let the publications of both be placed on an equality, so far as the Postal Service is concerned, and give everybody a square deal, while at the same time you secure additional revenue for the Government in its time of need.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER] 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for 15 minutes.

DEFINITE AND JUST WAR POLICIES—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], in a speech made on the floor of this House a few days ago, said:

> The situation that confronts the country is not getting far into the hearts and consciences of the people.

Statements like this have been repeatedly made on this floor during the last 30 days as well as from the floor of a coordinate branch of Congress. Where is the trouble? It is either with those in authority or with the people, and I am inclined to think it is not with the people.

DEFINITE WAR POLICIES.

We call this a war of democracy against autocracy. That is what it should be and that is what I want it to be. In shaping our war policies, both foreign and domestic, let us not lose sight of this issue. In adopting war policies two things must be kept in mind: The physical forces, men and money; and the psychological effect of such policies on the national concord. The policies so adopted should be such as tend to unify and enthuse all classes of our citizenship. Ever since we have been in session we have been conducting ourselves as though all it required to conduct a war successfully was to vote men and money. We have provided for an increase in our military forces of nearly 2,000,000 men. We have voted a credit of $7,000,000,000—twice as much as it cost the Federal Government to put down the Rebellion of 1861–1865, and now we are considering a revenue bill to raise nearly $2,000,000,000 by every conceivable form of taxation.

We have the men and the money in this country, but it is constantly being repeated, in and out of Congress, that the people do not know what we are fighting about; that the people are not aroused; that the people do not realize the sacrifices in blood and treasure that they will have to make. I do not assert that these statements are true. I simply state that these and similar statements are repeatedly made in and out of Congress. Let me tell you one thing, that you can not get anywhere in war without popular approval and support.

If you do not believe that statement, you can convince yourself by recalling the number of changes made necessary in policies, cabinets, and generals in European countries during this war to hold the confidence of the public mind. Gentlemen, we must have announced and definite objects and aims in this war that appeal to and meet the approval of the people who are back of the men and money we have voted. It will be in vain to vote billions in money and conscript millions of men unless we have back of this war the spirit and opinion of our people.

The President has aptly stated as one of our aims that the world must be made safe for democracy. That is a fine sentiment, but democracy means one thing to one person or class and quite another thing to another person or class. Neither the President nor Congress has undertaken to state our aims in this war in specific terms or what we would consider the accomplishment of the purposes for which we entered the war. I do not propose at this time to discuss our foreign policies. But I do want to tell you that the people are asking questions. I have before me a score or more of pertinent and relevant questions along this line taken from my correspondence. I will give you two of them: "What tangible and concrete things do you propose to accomplish by this war? Shall the Christian nations bleed themselves white and exhaust their resources while the yellow races are gathering strength and accumulating wealth to dominate the world when another evil day shall come?" The people, who will furnish the men for the firing line and who will pay the ever-increasing taxes, have a right to know why and for what purpose their blood and treasure is sacrificed.

We must make it plain to the people that we are not fighting for any aggrandizement; that we propose to be fair to all nations; and that we are not in this war to further the ambitions of any nation against another. We must make it very plain to our people that this war is not waged to increase the profits of munition makers nor to secure the foreign bonds held by our bankers nor to fasten a permanent militarism on this country. We must take the people into our confidence and constantly reassure them by our legislative acts—not words merely—of our righteous purposes in this war. If we do not, we can not and will not succeed. The great sovereign intelligent American public will insist on knowing the plans and policies of their Government and on their right to discuss and criticize them. If our plans and policies do appeal to the righteous and unselfish instincts of the people, then we can not fail.

DOMESTIC POLICIES.

I desire to direct my chief attention to questions of domestic or internal concern. While considering measures to bring this war to a succesful and just termination, we must not overlook those problems that touch every man, woman, and child in the land and the just and equitable solution of which will vitally affect our national concord and unity. If the laws that we shall pass here will permit some to amass vast wealth out of this war and cast the burdens and sacrifices upon the shoulders of the masses of our population, it will require no prophet to tell you that that will tend to discord and dissension.

Since the European war began a few in this country have amassed vast fortunes. This prosperity has not been shared by all. Take, for instance, the farmer. I received a letter from a constituent of mine this morning. He gives a few figures and I give them to you. He says in normal times a standard gang-stirring plow sold for from $50 to $58, to-day you can not buy it for less than $85; a standard grain binder in normal times sold for from $120 to $130, now you can not buy it for less than $200; corn now sells for $1.50 per bushel, but there is no corn in that community for sale; it was all sold for from 60 to 80 cents per bushel. The farmer has not received the high prices on foodstuffs, while the high prices on other necessaries have hit him as hard as anyone else.

The munitions makers have made tremendous profits out of this war. Now, we are in the war and we ought to have something to say about that. Under existing law the Government can control the prices it will pay for material of war, and the Government undoubtedly will do that. We have authorized a bond issue of $3,000,000,000 to furnish credit to governments at war against Germany. Most of this money will be spent in this country. We should see to it that this money is spent judiciously and not all paid in profits to war traffickers. The more profits these governments will have to pay, the less they can buy in war material and consequently will be a less-efficient aid to us. The less this money buys the more we will have to loan them and the more a certain class in this country will profit out of this war. For instance, the Duponts sell powder to this country for 53 cents a pound while they charge $1 a pound to the allied governments. This excess profit, unless curtailed, will be paid with money borrowed from the American people.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

War always means sacrifices and burdens to the many. Heretofore war has meant profit for a few. War should mean profit to none and sacrifices and burdens shared by all and victory to the Nation as a whole. [Applause.] The New York Times Annalist of April 23, 1917, shows that the wholesale price of 25 food commodities in common use has almost doubled in the last two years. Dun's index figures show similar price increases between April 1, 1914, and April 1, 1917:

	Per cent.
Dairy and garden products increased	84
Meat	46
Clothing	49
Metals	69
Foodstuffs	105

Similar increases are reported in other necessities as fuel and building material.

It is true that wages have increased some during this period. But the increase of wages has not nearly kept pace with the increased cost of necessities of life. The fact is forced home that the average American has not shared in the prosperity of this war period. With the inflation of prices of the things necessary to live, even with increased wages, the average citizen's purchasing power has been diminished. These facts must not be lost sight of in framing this new revenue measure and other bills pending before Congress.

The people must eat, must have clothes and shelter. The producer must not be asked to produce at a loss and the laborer must have a living wage. The speculator and gambler in the necessities of life must have provided for him a quick and easy road to the penitentiary. [Laughter and applause.]

CONSCRIPT DOLLARS AS WELL AS MEN.

What we should and must bear in mind in passing all this war legislation is equity and fair play to all alike—rich and poor, high and low. That is especially true in framing a war revenue law. Who shall fight and who shall pay? Congress has answered the former by conscription of men. The latter is up for consideration.

We have already voted a credit of $7,000,000,000. Along this line I desire to quote another statement by the President, which I also heartily indorse, that the credit granted to the Government should be sustained, "so far as they can equitably be sustained by the present generation, by well-conceived taxation." According to Henry Clews, financial authority and Wall Street broker, posterity will chiefly benefit from this war and should pay its part. Maybe posterity will benefit from this war, and maybe posterity will have wars of its own to pay for. I am not at all impressed with the idea of making our children and grandchildren pay for this war. The bond issue we voted is justified on the ground that we needed the credit immediately and could not wait on money to be raised by taxation. The property we will use and need in this war must come from our citizens. We can not get it from any other country. We can take that property now and pay for it by taxation, or we can place the greater part of the financial burden, by bonds, on those who are not here to speak for themselves. The former course is the manly and patriotic course; the latter appeals to me as unmanly and cowardly. [Applause.]

If we need soldiers we go where the men are and conscript them. If we need money we should pursue the same course—go where the dollars are and conscript them. [Applause.] Property is unequally distributed among the people, it is true. Prof. King, of the University of Wisconsin, reports that 2 per cent of the population owns 65 per cent of the total wealth of the country. Most of the men conscripted as soldiers will be from the poorer classes—not because the Government has it in for the poor, but because there is where the great mass of men are found. Most of the dollars of the country are among the wealthy class; therefore if the Government needs money it should conscript dollars from that class—not because the Government has it in for that class, but because that is where the dollars are. With me this is simply a question of fairness and compelling everyone to contribute that which is within his power to contribute. A few soldiers will be drawn from the rich, and a few dollars will be drawn from the poor. Conscription should apply to dollars as well as men. [Applause.] The men who will fight this war must come from those now living, so the funds to finance this war should be taken from wealth now in existence. Property should be forced to sacrifice as well as men.

PAY-AS-YOU-GO PLAN.

Paying for war as you go by taxation is based on the soundest economic principles. Bond issues lead to inflation of prices and throw the burdens on those least able to bear them. War borrowing leads to extravagance. War taxation leads to saving and economy. Financing the war by taxation has been indorsed by over 300 professors of economics, members of the American Economic Association of the United States, in a memorial issued during the last month and addressed to every Member of Congress. We heard much about following the advice of experts when the conscription bill was under consideration. Now I am presenting a proposition which has the indorsement of all the great experts of finance in the country. Why should not we follow the advice of experts in financing the war as well as in raising an army? [Applause.] Surely it can not be that in one case it affects money and in the other only men.

The chief sources for additional taxes at this time should be from the following:

1. A tax that will take substantially all of the special war profits.

2. Increase in the rates of income tax, with a sharper progression in rates as incomes become larger, to 100 per cent of all the income after a certain fixed amount.

3. High consumption taxes on all luxuries.

The chief objections I have to this bill is that it does not tax enough the big individual incomes and the special war profits. By increasing and collecting taxes along the lines I have suggested, we could relieve the normal business of the country from many annoying taxes, which in the final analysis will have to be paid by those least able to bear them.

When this bill was reported to the House with a unanimous report from the Committee on Ways and Means, I supposed it would go through without radical changes. I see from the report that the committee expected to raise a considerable portion of the taxes from intoxicating liquors. Saturday the Cummins amendment passed the Senate, which prohibits the use of cereals and grains in the production of intoxicating liquor during the period of the war. If the House concurs in that amendment, that source of revenue is gone. The committee must look elsewhere to raise about $300,000,000. Why not raise it from the large incomes and the special war profits? Changes will have to be made in this bill if we are going to raise the necessary taxes.

Mr. SIEGEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. SIEGEL. There is no necessity of discussing that, the other body has stricken it out.

Mr. RAMSEYER. A plan has been proposed by the American committee on war finance. I am not acquainted with the men on this committee, but I am informed they are patriotic, intelligent, and practical men. I am not authorized to speak for them, but as there is no copyright on their plan, I present it to you. It is to conscript all net incomes over $100,000. I realize that $100,000 is an arbitrary amount and should possibly be changed. The principle is all right and the Government should conscript all of the income over a certain fixed amount, which fixed limit should not exceed $500,000, in my judgment; however, personally I prefer the $100,000 limit. A man who is unwilling to give all of his income to the Government over $100,000 in times of awful war like this should be placed on the firing line and kept there until he would have no use for his next year's income.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I will.

Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman spoke about the tax on munition profits. I was told yesterday that a munition manufacturer in Bradford, Canada, with a capital of $66,000 paid $30,000 taxes to the Canadian Government.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I thank the gentleman for the information. The tax on special war profits is way beyond anything we have here.

The rates proposed by this committee are as follows:

Example to show how the proposed legislation would conscript all income in excess of $100,000:

1. Tax on income of $150,000—

Normal tax:
2 per cent on the entire net income, $150,000	$3,000
Additional tax
10 per cent on $10,000 between $10,000 and $20,000	1,000
15 per cent on $20,000 between $20,000 and $40,000	3,000
20 per cent on $20,000 between $40,000 and $60,000	4,000
30 per cent on $20,000 between $60,000 and $80,000	6,000
40 per cent on $20,000 between $80,000 and $100,000	8,000
50 per cent on $50,000 between $100,000 and $150,000	25,000
Total tax	50,000
This would leave a residual income of	100,000

2. Tax on income over $150,000—

One hundred and fifty thousand dollars would be taxed as above, $50,000, and of the excess over $150,000, 2 per cent would be taken by the normal tax and 98 per cent by the additional tax, i. e., 100 per cent in all. This would leave a residual income of $100,000.

It is estimated that the rates advocated will yield for the next fiscal year about $1,500,000,000.

Although the plan of this committee is not the identical proposition recommended by the members of the American Economic Association, their purpose is the same—that is, to pay for the war by taxation. The chief objection urged against conscripting all or the larger part of the big incomes is that it would take money needed for investment in new enterprises. These objectors lose sight of the fact that the money and material used by us in this war must come from our own country, and that to sell bonds to raise, for example, $3,000,000,000 takes just as much money that might otherwise have gone into new enterprises as it does to raise $3,000,000,000 by the scheme of taxation proposed, or any other scheme. And as bonds tend to inflation of prices it will take more money to conduct the war by bonds than by taxation and consequently divert more money that might otherwise have gone into new enterprises.

The advocates of bonds to finance the war urge that we should go about this in a businesslike way—sell bonds for the war as a municipal corporation issues bonds to pay for public improvement. The difference is easy. Public improvements are lasting and of benefit to succeeding generations, while every dollar placed in war is destroyed. It is true succeeding generations may be benefited on account of certain wars in being permitted to live in better environment, but there are no permanent improvements from which they derive financial benefits, as they do in case of bond issues to construct public buildings, permanent roads, drainage systems, and so forth.

Another objection I have heard is, if you take all of a man's income over a certain fixed amount, you will take away from him all incentive to produce and accumulate. There is but one answer to this objection. This is war and every man must do his full part. A man, in war time like this, who will not put forth as much energy to produce for fear that his country will conscript his income above a certain fixed amount ought to be treated just as a deserter from the Army—tried by court-martial and shot the next morning before sunrise. To tax the small incomes as this bill proposes, and not to take over 50 per cent from the man whose income amounts up in the millions, I tell you in these days of the high cost of living, and war prices soaring higher every day, is unfair and inequitable to the men who must depend on small incomes, wages, and salaries for a living for themselves and families.

Men who are opposed to paying for the war by taxation and against conscripting large incomes do not weigh seriously enough the demands of justice. In the language of the memorial referred to by me—

> It is the duty of every citizen to share in war's burdens to his utmost. For some the duty is to fight; for others, to furnish money. For all the duty is without limit of amount. The citizen who contributes even his entire income beyond what is necessary to subsistence itself does less than the citizen who contributes himself to the Nation.

[Applause.]

The proposition may sound new, unusual, and revolutionary to men accustomed to draw revenue bills. But we are living in unusual times. Every act of Congress is being watched by the people. The question they will ask us is, Is your course and policy fair, equitable, and just to all the people? The common man will readily grasp the proposition that "if the conscription of men is just and right the conscription of incomes and property is more so; conscription of both is just and right when the Nation's life and honor is at stake." [Applause.]

In all, I seek for my Nation policies—both domestic and foreign—that will appeal to the hearts and consciences of the people as just and right. If we keep that firmly in mind we can not and will not go astray or find our policies disapproved and repudiated by the people.

The people will do their part in this war. Men will come to the Army faster than they can be trained and equipped by the War Department. Money will pour into the National Treasury faster than the administration can spend it. What I am contending for in these times is laws so just and equitable that no class of our citizens will have occasion to feel that they are not getting a fair and square deal and for a foreign policy worthy of our traditions and of our boasted leadership among the democracies of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a petition of the Soda Water Bottling Manufacturers of Massachusetts in connection with this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to print a petition in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4280, the war-revenue bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW—10.30 A. M.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, is it expected that general debate will run all day to-morrow?

Mr. KITCHIN. I was hoping to finish about 4 o'clock. I was talking with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], and I told him that if we could have an hour and fifteen minutes you gentlemen on the other side might take the balance of the time, and we thought we could close debate at about that time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 15, 1917, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 15, 1917.

(Legislative day of Friday, May 11, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock m., on the expiration of the recess.

INCREASE OF NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3330) to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I have a bill in charge which will require no discussion whatever. It is the bill (S. 1811) providing for the counting of service in the Army or Navy of the United States as equivalent to residence and cultivation upon homestead entries, and in the event of the soldier's death in such service providing for the issuance of patent for such land to his widow or minor children. Practically the same measure has been passed as to the soldiers of the Spanish War and also as to the Philippine insurrection. It seems to me that it will require no discussion whatever. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think it would lead to debate. However, I shall object to any business but the unfinished business at any time coming up to-day until this unfinished business is disposed of, whether that business requires debate or whether it does not.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will say to the Senator that a similar bill as to mining claims was lately passed here in five minutes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know; but there is a bill before the Senate that ought to pass the Senate in less than three minutes.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be considered first.

Mr. McCUMBER. I shall object to the committee amendments being considered first, and I will give my reasons for it. There is only one-half of one page of this whole bill that relates to an increase in the Navy. The other fourteen and a half pages are devoted entirely to the creation of officers, admirals, and so forth. I do not want to wait before offering an amendment to the beginning of the bill until the Senate has spent three weeks in disposing of the admiral question.

Mr. SWANSON. There was very little discussion or division so far as the committee amendments are concerned. I understand that it is the rule, anyway, and that usually committee amendments are disposed of first.

Mr. McCUMBER. If there is a rule it can be done, and of course I can not object to the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is only a rule by unanimous consent.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not understand it to be the rule. I have no objection to the bill being read for amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the reading begins let me suggest that while these seats have ears they have no judgment. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hollis	New	Smoot
Beckham	James	Norris	Sterling
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal	Owen	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Swanson
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Penrose	Thomas
Culberson	Kellogg	Pittman	Thompson
Cummins	Kendrick	Pomerene	Townsend
Curtis	Kenyon	Ransdell	Trammell
Dillingham	King	Robinson	Underwood
Fernald	Kirby	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Fletcher	Knox	Shafroth	Wadsworth
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Sheppard	Warren
Gallinger	Lodge	Sherman	Watson
Gerry	McCumber	Simmons	Weeks
Gore	McKellar	Smith, Ga.	Wolcott
Gronna	Martin	Smith, Md.
Hardwick	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Hitchcock	Nelson	Smith, S. C.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] on account of illness. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill for amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the authorized enlisted strength of the active list of the Navy is hereby temporarily increased from 87,000 to 150,000, including 4,000 additional apprentice seamen.

SEC. 2. That the authorized enlisted strength of the active list of the Marine Corps is hereby temporarily increased from 17,400 to 30,000, this authorized strength being distributed in the various grades of the enlisted force in the same proportion as those authorized at the date of the approval of this act.

SEC. 3. That enlistments in the Navy and Marine Corps, during such time as the United States may be at war, shall be for four years or for the period of the war or for such shorter period or periods as the President may prescribe.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, not a Senator, except the Senator having charge of the bill and probably one or two others, is paying the slightest attention to the reading of this portion of the bill. Each one is engaged in conversation with his neighbor. At this time I think it appropriate to offer an amendment. If the Senator in charge of the bill has no objection, I will offer my proposed amendment at this stage, because sections 1, 2, and 3 of the bill contain practically everything there is in the bill, about a half a page, concerning an increase of the Navy and the Marine Corps. All the rest of it relates, as I said before, to the creation of officers, admirals, and so forth, and all the promotions pointing toward a large number of admirals who will be on the retired list when the war is over.

In the meantime, Mr. President, we have a matter, of small concern, I admit, considering the objections that have been made against it so far, and that is the submarine question, which I propose, whether I have any listeners or not, to discuss for a few moments this morning.

I shall offer an amendment which will provide for a board to take up and consider proposed inventions and proposed mechanisms for the protection of merchant vessels. I shall steer entirely clear of any matter concerning the destruction of the submarine. I wish, if it is possible, to bring the attention of the Senate to the question of a possibility of protecting the merchant vessels, not against the submarine but against the torpedo that has left the submarine.

I desire, first, to read an extract from the Post of May 10, four days ago. It is dated London, May 9:

The Reichstag has begun its second reading of the navy budget. Dr. Pfleger, naval reporter of the budget committee, declared that the submarine booty for April would not be less than 1,100,000 tons, and added that the Reichstag looked for a speedy and victorious peace. Vice Admiral von Capell, minister of the navy, said:

THOUSANDS BUILDING U BOATS.

"Thousands upon thousands of hands are actively engaged in producing new U boats and new material for torpedoes and mines. Not only is the number of U boats continually increasing, but the boats are always improving in quality.

"Of course, losses also occur. Our enemies' defenses are increasing in quantity and quality, but there is no radical remedy against U boats.

"A decisive factor is the continually increasing monthly successes, which we ourselves hardly expected. The reports in the enemy press about the number of U boats lost are false. Our losses are small beyond expectation. In addition, weather conditions are improving."

Then it proceeds further. I will read the final paragraph:

1,325 SHIPS DESTROYED.

We expected an average monthly U-boat booty of about 600,000 tons. Actually the result for three months totals 2,800,000 tons. This is 55 per cent above our expectations. In three months 1,325 ships have been sunk.

The U boats guarantee our holding out.

This is rather old, as from 200,000 to 250,000 tons have gone down since May 9.

Mr. President, on Friday, April 27, when the Senate had under consideration a bill for the creation of an army of a million men to put into the line of battle in Europe, with little or no thought whatever as to how or whether that army, or any portion of it, could be transported to Europe, I presented to the Senate facts and figures showing the devastation of the submarine in all its awful reality, and pointed out its fatal effect on this war unless checked. I tried at that time to secure the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, having that bill under consideration, to an amendment which might result in a solution of this submarine menace, and thereby might make our victory sure without the necessity of sending a single transport of our soldiers to battle in the trenches; and I showed that without such a solution famine would defeat our allies before we could get into the war. I regret that I failed to secure either a respectable hearing or a decent consideration of so momentous a matter. And when finally the amendment was offered under the five-minute-debate rule, with no opportunity on my part to answer any objections, none of which had been made to the merit of the amendment, it was brushed aside by the bald declaration of the acting chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs that there is now a board in the Navy Department investigating this matter thoroughly and having all the money that is needed, and that the bill then under consideration would be followed by a naval bill, which last bill would be the proper one to which to offer this proposed legislation. Eighteen days have elapsed since the Army bill was voted on, and no naval bill has been forthcoming until to-day. During this period of inaction at least 200 ships and about 600,000 tons of shipping have been sunk by the German submarines. In the face of the fact that these ships can be protected from the submarine torpedo, every day's delay of the Senate constitutes a negligence which, to my mind, is little less than treasonable under present conditions.

Mr. President, there has not been and there is no board in existence having the power to do anything whatever toward the protection of the merchant vessel. But upon the mere suggestion that such a board existed, and without any opportunity to refute it, Senators who had paid no attention to any of the facts presented voted against the proposed amendment. Why? They had been too busy to give the submarine problem any consideration. And why too busy? Because, Mr. President, they had just spent more than two hours on the Senate floor in discussing whether they should put into that Army bill an amendment to protect the Members of the United States Senate from the demon of alcoholism. And after this lengthy deliberation this august body, in the face of one of the greatest dilemmas, in the face of one of the most acute crises that ever confronted the world, brought forth from the profound recesses of its gigantic intelligence and embodied in the Army bill the following provision:

It shall be unlawful to sell, offer, or give away any intoxicating liquors, including beer, ale, or wine, to any Member of the Congress, or to knowingly furnish to such person intoxicating liquors.

It is the first time, Mr. President, I have ever heard of one pleading mental deficiency and then presuming to enact the law to govern his own incapacity. And this provision was strengthened with dire penalties of fines and imprisonments.

I wish, Mr. President, that this provision, which commanded the attention of Senators and caused them to forget even this desperate crisis and even the bill under consideration, could be printed on the walls of the Senate Chamber, so that when any Senator should arise in his seat, in the future, and with swelling chest announce that this is the greatest deliberative body in the world—an announcement which I have heard, I think, several thousand times—it might bring a sense of humiliation and a contrite heart that would choke the utterance.

So, too, the Senator from Oregon, having charge of the Army bill, felt disposed to suggest that any amendment which dealt with the defense of a merchant vessel ought not to be considered on an Army measure, notwithstanding the fact that the whole issue of this war is dependent upon the protection of the merchant vessel, and notwithstanding the further fact that the vessels of our allies and our own American merchant ships are going down to the bottom of the ocean, with all their cargoes, at the rate of at least 10 per day, with a tonnage of about 400,000 per week. The Senator thought an amendment dealing with that vital problem could wait weeks—could bide its time until some measure relating to the Navy might come before the Senate. But the learned Senator evidently felt that the amendment prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors to Members of the Senate was too important and too imminent to admit of any delay, and so he could not object to the consideration of that amendment.

I am not criticizing the Senator, because I am compelled to admit that, considering the mental state of any Senate that would vote such a ridiculous proposition into the Army bill, the Senator from Oregon might well be justified in making no objection to this prohibition clause.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator, with his permission, that that was not put into the bill in the committee, but was done on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know that it was done on the floor of the Senate, but it was done without any objection whatever from the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I beg the Senator's attention to the fact that it was my suggestion that the original amendment should go into the bill instead of the one of which the Senator is complaining.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator voted against that amendment; but that amendment was offered and the Senator did not raise the question that it should not go upon the bill at that time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I still think, with all due deference to the lecture which the Senator has been giving the Senate, that that was a measure that properly ought to have been directed to the attention of the Naval Committee and ought to have been attached to a naval bill, or ought to have been introduced as a separate and independent measure. The Senator from North Dakota had that right, which he has never exercised.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, there is no question but the Senator from Oregon made that statement and that the Senator so thought; but it seems to me that when the Senator thought that such an important proposition as the one suggested by me could bide its time for three weeks until a naval bill should come into the Senate, the Senator might have raised an objection to such a ridiculous amendment as was proposed to be put into the Army bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that I am heartily in favor of restricting the use of liquors amongst the soldiers, the young men of this country; and I say that, basing my statement on what the German authorities have said. They have said that the use of liquor in the German Army has been more disastrous than have the bullets which they have had to confront. And that has been the testimony of all the belligerents in the European war.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not going to stop to argue that question; that was not the proposition of sticking in an amendment here that specially related to Congress and the soldiers, but not to the rest of the country.

But the objection of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] in the light of the enormous daily devastation of these unseen sea monsters, on the ground that the amendment would be more relevant to a naval bill than to an Army bill, is simply astounding. An objection, in a crisis of this kind, to such an amendment on any bill that would speed its passage is as ridiculous as a passenger on a sinking ship refusing to accept a life preserver because its color did not match his hose.

While these Senators were so insistent that a provision relating to the protection of a merchant vessel could only be appropriately attached to a naval bill, I am surprised that each of them failed to realize that a bill prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors to Members of the Senate would be more appropriate to an irrigation bill or even a flood-control bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, to those who read the daily reports of marine disasters it would seem unnecessary to spend one moment explaining what these disasters mean in this war. For more than a year I have been attempting, in my feeble and modest way, to attract the attention of the Senate to the importance of the submarine in this war and what it will accomplish unless we find means to successfully combat it. To-day we are up against a critical situation. The administration and the Congress of the United States seem to fail to realize the situation that is threatening us. Had they so realized it we would have proceeded in the logical way. We would have considered the most imminent problem first—the feeding of our allies. We would have concentrated all our energies and skill upon encouraging the inventive genius of our own country and of the world to help us solve that problem, not along some one particular line or some particular way, but along every possible line of defense. The moment we declared war we would have taken up the question of food supply. We did not do it. We began the organization of an army which could not be utilized under a year. With the submarine accomplishing a devastation that would bring our allies to starvation in six months, we stuck our heads in the sand and dreamed of armies that would be marching a year hence. We closed our ears to the groans of the dying, our eyes to the struggles of the drowning, while we were painting pictures of the Stars and Stripes floating over the trenches of heroic France next year. It is time, Mr. President, we awake to the real situation.

I want to make one last attempt to impress upon this Senate the more than serious aspect of this submarine question, and then point out what I believe will be the only solution, and I am not going to be deterred by the fallacious claim that this is a subject for naval experts only. It is sufficient answer to that to say that the naval experts have had the matter under consideration for nearly three years and have done absolutely nothing, while they have been declaring over and over again that the main thing to which we should direct our efforts is the building of superdreadnaughts.

One of the morning papers of April 30 gave the following from the address made by Dr. Karl Helfferich, German secretary of the interior, to the Reichstag on April 29. He said:

The first month's result of unrestricted submarine warfare excelled the best previous results by 25 per cent; the second month's by 50 per cent. Exact figures can not be given, but in the first two months the freight tonnage sunk exceeded 1,600,000 tons, of which more than 1,000,000 was British.

* * * * * * *

From our figures one may estimate the total tonnage still available for British trade at seven to ten million tons. It is clear the British merchant fleet can not long bear sinkings at the present rate. Adequate substitutes by new construction are impossible, as the British increase in ships in 1916, notwithstanding every effort, was not sufficient even to replace the normal diminution in peace times.

Now, mark these words:

The wooden ships which the United States intends to build to save Great Britain will in all probability only come into use when they have nothing more to save.

That is true. He concluded with these words:

We in Germany have been kept short, but we stand secure. The American apostles of humanity, who are trying to drive our neutral neighbors to war against us with threats of death, will not turn the scales of fate.

I would to Heaven, Mr. President, that these statements made by the German secretary of the interior were mere braggadocio. They are not. We ought to have had judgment enough to have known that Germany would never have defied the United States unless she felt that before the United States could get into this war she could starve the British. She is proceeding along that line. She may retreat day by day along her western battle front, stopping only to inflict greater losses upon her enemies on the offensive than she is suffering, acting only on the defensive. Bold and courageous as have been the British drives, conceding to them and to their French allies any amount of glory for the desperate battle they are putting up day and night, forcing the foe backward, the fact still remains that the fighting line, which is being pressed eastward a few hundred yards per day, is still 130 to 140 miles from the German border. Germany expects simply to hold her defensive lines until the submarine can accomplish its purpose. And we are giving practically no real or valuable consideration to how we may meet this most important problem.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator intend to say to the Senate, and have it go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that the average distance from the German line in France to the German border is from 130 to 140 miles?

Mr. McCUMBER. The average distance may have been reduced now to 120 miles. The line runs very close to the German border at its southern extremity, of course; but the German forces have taken nearly one-fifth of France, which is still in German hands, as well as practically all of Belgium. At the southern end of the line the allied armies are nearer to the German border; but, taking the line as a whole, its average distance from the German border, I would judge, after getting away from the point where it is rather close to the German border, is between 130 and 140 miles. I take these figures from the last statement published in the metropolitan press, which gave those figures as to the distance, and that statement was published a short time ago.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, of course I do not mean to interrupt the Senator's address, but his statement as to the distance of the allied lines from the German border is so extreme, and his further statement to the effect that one-fifth of France is in the hands of the Germans is so utterly extreme, that I can not help but classify it as part of that panic which is apparently sought to be created all over this country as to the desperate situation of ourselves and our allies. For one, I can not let this occasion go by—and I am trenching, of course, upon the time of the Senator from North Dakota—without stating that this war is not lost, as would seem to be the impression one might gather from the Senator's remarks. His figures, in my humble judgment, are utterly inaccurate not only as to the amount of territory occupied by German forces but as to the nature of the military events upon the western line in France.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am very thankful to be informed by the Senator; but, as a matter of fact, the record will show that the distance ranges from 130 to 140 miles. I want that to soak in. Before I get through with the discussion of this matter I will try to produce a map showing where the lines were at the time the last map was printed. I am not generally making statements to which I have given no consideration whatever. I have taken the statements, as I have told the Senator, from a publication of less than a week or so ago not only in the Washington Post but also in the New York papers, the Washington Post having reprinted the map appearing in the New York papers.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. McCUMBER. In just a moment. Just here I want to say another thing. We have been saying right along that there was no danger whatever. We have been telling the world that the allies would crush Germany in a few months. We are gradually waking up to the absolute truth, that the submarine is destroying in a month more shipping than the world so far and all the shipyards of the world have been able to produce in the whole year 1916. What I am saying is not begotten of panic; it is to direct the thought of the Committee on Naval Affairs and of the American people to the real situation. I am going to disclose conditions that will show that the Senate ought to have been ashamed to have spent nearly three weeks in the consideration of the bill that only passed last night in the face of the tremendous loss to the shipping of the world and loss of the cargoes carried by that shipping. I now yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is no doubt that a most vital situation is created by the submarine menace, but then the Senator ought to be reassured in that matter. The submarine menace has now been confronting the entire world for two years and a half at least and has been one of the great central features of the war, but we are making progress toward dealing with it. I notice in the Washington Post of May 4 large headlines on the front page of that paper stating that as one incident growing out of the visit of the French and the British high commissioners to the United States, after several conferences with the diplomatic and the naval experts of this Government, these representatives of the allies and their new ally, the United States, were considering—and the Senator ought to bear this in mind, that they are now beginning to consider, so this article says—a campaign to attack the submarines at their bases.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am very glad to know that they are beginning to consider it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; I think the Senator ought to bear that in mind.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it is about time they began to consider it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is a little, narrow strait between Denmark and Norway and narrow exits around Helgoland through which submarines constructed in Germany necessarily must pass in order to roam along the avenues of commerce of the world and find their prey. They have been doing that for two years and more.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why have they not stopped them?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, they will stop them, undoubtedly, because we are beginning to consider now shutting them off at these narrow entrances, and there is not any doubt at all that eventually some move will be made to attack the submarines at that point.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, Mr. President, if they are beginning to consider the matter, after having seen the shipping wiped off the seas as it has been in the last few months, there is some slight encouragement; but I want to say to the Senator that I have not been so negligent in this matter that I have not read all of that literature, and also read that which came in the daily papers after it. I have read the big headlines saying that we have discovered a means of immediately annihilating the submarine, and that it would be a question of the past; and I have read the headlines in the next day's paper saying that that was a mistake and that they had just begun to think, as the Senator has suggested, along lines of destruction. I am going to deal with that very article before I get through.

Mr. President, the headlines from the New York World of May 2 read:

Americans urged to act at once in checking U boats—French and British officials call for more food ships—Losses greater than can be replaced, says Lord Percy.

The article declares:

British naval experts accompanying the commission headed by Foreign Secretary Balfour have impressed upon officials of this Government the importance of moving as speedily as possible to stay the destruction of the merchant marine of the world carrying munitions and supplies to the armies.

The French naval representatives are fully in accord with the pessimistic views that their British ally takes of the outlook unless some method is speedily devised to curtail the sinking of cargo ships in the German submarine zone.

The Post of May 3 headlines an article on this situation as follows—and I especially call the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] to these headlines, because I think he will find them fully as startling as anything that I have said now in the Senate on this situation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I hope the Senator does not intend to rival the headlines of the press in making startling statements.

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; I would scarcely dare to do that; but the Senator, who has been able to read them every morning, ought not to be startled by the naked truth being told in the Senate.

The Post of May 3 reads as follows:

Allies facing disaster—America menaced as U boats sweep the sea—Impossible to exaggerate the situation, declares Lansing—

Now, Mr. Lansing did make that declaration—

Conditions critical, admit members of British mission—Life of France and Great Britain at stake—Germany has supplies for two years—Only hope declared to lie in speeding up American shipbuilding.

That is as strong as anything that I have said to-day, and possibly a little stronger. I pause here long enough to declare emphatically that this is a forlorn hope; that the real hope and, in my opinion, the only hope lies in protecting each individual ship. A single submarine has sunk nine ships in a single day. It would take half a year to construct one. It is impossible to build as rapidly as the ever-increasing numbers of submarines can destroy. We must thwart the torpedo. That is what I am trying to impress upon the Senate.

This article declares:

The enormous inroads in the world's shipping made by the German submarines within the last few weeks has brought to American Government officials a full realization of the disaster that faces the United States and the allies if the undersea warfare is not checked. Secretary Lansing told the conference that the great destruction of ships was threatening the existence of Great Britain and France and menacing the United States.

Secretary Lansing in a statement during the day declared the seriousness of the submarine situation could not be exaggerated and that it was time the country awoke to the true facts. Reports to the State Department give a total of 80 vessels lost in one week.

Now, there is no questioning that. The fact is that there were 82 of them lost that week, when you get the full number.

"The world's shipping construction in 1916 was less than 2,000,000 tons. If the Germans keep up their present rate of destruction, officials admit without hesitation that their campaign threatens to sweep clean the seas.

"The seriousness of the situation is apparent," said Chairman Denman yesterday. "When we consider the present productivity of the world's shipyards and their highest output likely within the next four months, the entire production will not exceed one-fifth of the monthly loss at the rate given by Secretary Lane."

I wish I had the power to impress this truth upon the Congress and upon the country, the truth declared by our own expert on shipping, that the world's shipyards can not produce in four months one-fifth of the shipping which German submarines are sending to the bottom in one month. If we could so absorb this truth, we might bring the thought of the naval world to bear on the question of shielding the ship against the torpedo.

A very strong editorial in the World of May 4 proposed a standardized ship of 3,000 tons, both steel and wooden, with the hope that we could turn out several thousand of them in a year. But, Mr. President, the present type of 3,000-ton ships, with their 14 knots an hour, is the easiest of all prey for the submarine. If we are to attempt to build faster than the submarines can sink, our only hope is in producing a merchant vessel of double that speed; and even that hope would be slight indeed.

Lord Percy declares that on the result of the race between the combined shipbuilding capacities of the United States and Great Britain and the destruction caused by the German submarine campaign will depend the final issue of the war.

I am quoting rather lavishly, I will admit, but from authorities on both sides of the ocean and those who know of what they are speaking.

If that be true, Mr. President, as suggested by Lord Percy, the final issue of this war is settled, and settled against us, because, as has already been demonstrated, the shipyards of the world are incapable of producing in four months more ships than the German submarines are now sinking in one month. Mr. President, we are spending our time, in my opinion, foolishly in labor on our great warships. We are studying out plans to defend the warship while we are neglecting the only thing that can save this war—the protection of the merchant shipping.

I wish to quote just one more excerpt from the Post of May 3, under the headlines, "Germany to have 700 U boats soon":

GERMANY TO HAVE 700 U BOATS SOON—EXPERT WARNS THAT UNITED STATES MAY YET FACE KAISER'S FLEET.

NEW YORK, May 2.

The central powers may have 200 submarines afloat, and I believe that it is possible that they have many more than that, and if, as is more than likely, they have some 500 on the ways at the present time, this would mean that in six months they would have 700 U boats available and 1,200 by next spring.

That is, by the time we will have an army ready.

That was the deliberate and well-considered statement made to-night by J. Bernard Walker, editor of the Scientific American, chairman of the navy committee of the National Security League, at the annual meeting of the league at the Astor Hotel. Mr. Walker spoke as an expert, who had been making a deep study of his subject. He gave statistics of the number of German shipbuilding yards and their capacity, so far as known to-day, and underestimated rather than overestimated in his deductions. Continuing, he said:

"But you ask, Can they supply crews for such a large number of submarines? I answer that the German naval personnel exceeds 150,000 men. Her idle battleships can supply all the men required.

"Here, as I see it, is the immediate danger point in this great conflict into which we have now entered. It is here that we should apply, and should at once apply, our whole effort. If we refuse to do this and elect to fight a purely defensive war, and the allies should have to make a peace favorable to Germany, we may ultimately find ourselves face to face with the high-seas fleet of Germany—of twice the strength of our own to-day."

When this proposed amendment was up for final action, I had but five minutes to present it. It had been previously discussed in the Senate Chamber, but at a time when that Chamber was minus the usual number of Senators. The acting chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, who had heard no portion of the discussion of the amendment when it was discussed in full, met this serious problem with these words:

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not be adopted. This bill will be followed by the naval bill, and that is the proper measure on which to discuss naval matters and naval legislation.

The Senator is absent again, of course, from the Chamber while we are discussing a matter that is most vital to our success in this war, and a matter which certainly belongs on the particular bill he referred to some three weeks ago. There are not many Senators in the Senate Chamber, Mr. President, to pay any attention to this; and I presume that those who are out at lunch, or smoking their cigars in the cloakrooms, will meander leisurely back into the Senate, and, not having heard anything about this question except such as they get from some clerk down in the department, will come back into the Senate and vote "nay" upon any proposition for any kind of an amendment.

But, Mr. President, the Senator was mistaken. It was not followed by the naval bill. Eighteen days have elapsed during which probably two-thirds of a million tons of shipping have been sunk.

Again, he said:

I would like to say for the information of the Senator, that there is now a consulting board in the Navy Department, with Edison at the head, investigating this matter thoroughly.

Mistaken again. There is no consulting board that is investigating this question, either thoroughly or in any other way.

Again, he said:

It (this board) has all the money that is needed.

Mistaken again. There has been no board created by law, and this congregation of divers people who, through the grace of the Secretary of the Navy, are allowed the privilege of sitting together and talking about things in general have at their disposal an appropriation of $25,000, not enough to pay clerk hire, and yet the Senator says they have all the money they need. Yes; if they do nothing, of course, that is true. Mr. President, a torpedo costs $10,000 and your appropriation would be used up in the firing of two torpedoes.

Again says the Senator from Virginia:

It requires no more to discover protection for a merchant ship than a naval ship. The one requires the same protection from a submarine that the other does. Anything that will protect one ship will protect another ship.

Once again the Senator is woefully mistaken.

But he will come in again when this is offered as an amendment and will simply declare that there is a board created which is discussing this matter thoroughly, and it has all the money it needs for its use; and the absent Senators who will not take the trouble to look the matter up will come in and vote as usual against any amendment that will propose to deal with this submarine question. It does not require a seaman or even an expert to realize that a certain mechanism that might protect a war vessel could not be utilized at all upon the lighter-draft merchant ship. The armor itself upon a war vessel, with compartments, might be at least a partial defense against the torpedo. The very weight of such armor would sink a merchant vessel. Is it possible that the Senator can not readily realize that a dreadnaught with a draft of from 30 to 40 feet, with an enormous displacement, might have its center of gravity scarcely disarranged by a net of chains projecting 20 feet from its hull, while the same arrangement in a rough sea would capsize a lighter merchant vessel drawing 15 to 20 feet.

My information is that Mr. Edison is giving his time and research to the matter of discovering through sound the whereabouts of the submarine. That may help to some extent—very little, indeed. Suppose we find out that there is a submarine a couple of miles away, and that we can even learn not only its distance but its location by the sound. We can not see it; and I do not believe we would accomplish very much by shooting at a sound. The chances are a thousand to one that the submarine has seen us long before we have heard the sound, and its torpedo is on its way.

I read into the RECORD the other day a letter from an inventor, which said—now, I am going to repeat this statement; I do not know that Senators will pay any attention to it, but it is right on this question that your board is not considering the merchant ships at all. This letter reads:

On offering my invention to protect merchant ships against torpedoes I was informed by Capt. Smith, who passes on inventions for Secretary Daniels, that the Navy Department is not interested in the protection of merchant ships, and that I must offer my invention to the merchant-ship owners.

Mr. President, that is absolutely true. Capt. Smith has stated substantially the same thing to me, not that he is not interested in the protection of merchant ships, but because the merchant ships belong to the citizens of the United States and not to the Government that they will not give them consideration, and if he has anything that is to protect the merchant ships, let him take it to the owners. It might be just as well here to explain that there is no civil board, advisory or otherwise, that passes judgment as to whether any invention or proposition for defense or offense connected with our naval program justifies the cost of making experiments with it. Capt. Smith, connected with this so-called board as advisory member, simply refers that which he considers of merit to the naval board. It would be an act of lèse majesté for him to attempt to impose his conviction upon this board. I am not criticizing any naval board, construction or otherwise. They are human as the rest of us. The failure of naval constructors or naval boards to devise any means of protecting a ship against a torpedo working its way through the waves is a criticism of itself stronger than any words can express.

I come now, Mr. President, to a matter of the most stupendous and aggravating national negligence concerning the submarine question. In support of the Senator from Virginia against such an unheard-of thing in this Senate as ingrafting by amendment on one bill a proposition relating to a different subject, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] stated—I am glad the Senator is here now, so that I can quote his words:

Mr. President, I was informed at the Navy Department that shields can be used on battleships to protect such ships from being torpedoed, and they said they could be used on the merchant ships, but that they were too expensive to be used, and the owners of the marchant ships would not put them on. And on that account they are prey to the torpedoes.

Can it be possible, Mr. President, that this is true?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield in just a moment. Can it be possible that Great Britain and the United States have had knowledge right along that merchant vessels can be protected by shields from the submarine torpedo and yet are allowing the merchant tonnage and cargoes, upon which the very life at least of Great Britain, France, and Italy depends, to be fed to the ocean? Can it be possible that they are crying out that starvation is staring them in the face and that unless the submarine destruction can be checked they can not maintain this war and must surrender to this new sea monster because the protective shield is too expensive?

I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator from North Dakota that the authority which I have for the statement which I made in my remarks the other day was the same Capt. Smith to whom he refers. He made the statement to me that that was the condition, and he illustrated it by the fact that there had been no battleships torpedoed, or at least none to any extent, and that they have no difficulty in shielding the battleships, but that the owners of the merchant ships found it so expensive to put that same shield upon their vessels that they could not make a remunerative return upon their investment; and for that reason they did not do it.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is absolutely correct. Capt. Smith told me substantially the same thing. May I ask the Senator is he a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I am not. I am not a member of either the Committee on Military Affairs or the Naval Committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, that accounts, I suppose, for no provision being made in the Naval Committee to use these simple devices that can protect our merchant ships. The Senator, of course, being from the maritime State of Colorado, any suggestion that he might make or that I may make would have very little consideration by a committee that is dealing with the question and having hearings by naval experts every day; but both he and I can understand what the trouble is, and we can understand where the Government has been negligent.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state that I have had difficulty enough in trying to get measures through the committees of which I am a member instead of going to other committees where I can not receive as much consideration as from the committees of which I am a member.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am glad there are others.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the Chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. HUSTING. Just at this moment, if the Senator please, I will state that I have had a talk with sundry officers in the Navy Department. I do not know that I am at liberty to quote them, but it was to the effect that there was a device, but to be practical it would require dry-docking the vessels to apply it, and that they can not be applied because our docking facilities are too meager to enable us to provide the vessels with shields in time to be of any use.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thank the Senator. There is still another reason which I shall give in a very short time. If it had been demonstrated that these shields could be used successfully, then the Senator has given the reason why they have not been used, because the Government does not own those ships. They are privately owned; and I will tell the Senator the cost of putting them and the cost of propelling that extra weight across the ocean would be so great that there is more profit in insuring them against destruction and thereby selling them to the insurance companies.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield in just a moment. It would occur to the Senator from Colorado as it has occurred to the Senator from North Dakota that if there has been even a promise of success along a line of that kind the administration has been guilty of criminal negligence if it has not tried it out and determined whether or not it was a success; and if it was a success then a bill should have been introduced here long ago commandeering our shipping and putting the shields upon them. The question is not so much the cost but the vital question is whether we are going to get our food across the ocean. Remember that the contents of the cargo in many instances are worth far more than the ship itself.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from North Dakota yield further to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. SHAFROTH. As to whether or not anybody has been negligent in the way of devising means of evading the effect of the torpedo I do not know, but I will state to the Senator that we are to have a bill before the Senate on to-morrow which appropriates $750,000,000 for the construction of ships, and it seems to me to be very advisable that some experiments at least be made with some of those vessels. The vessels are for the purpose of shipping foodstuffs to the allies, and as the Government is constructing them itself it has the means of putting upon the vessels the very shields that it is said are a safeguard. It seems to me it would be wise to attempt to put this invention upon these vessels so as to avoid the fatal effect of the submarine.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was not in the Chamber when the Senator spoke a little while ago. I should like to know about what is the cost of these shields. Taking the average ocean liner, can the Senator state about what the cost of making a shield on such a ship would be?

Mr. McCUMBER. The cost is very great; and that is the best information I could get. Of course, it would depend very much upon the character of the shields. Remember that a shield plate half an inch in thickness, struck by the nose of a torpedo, would probably explode the torpedo. Therefore a shield sufficient to guard the entire ship would not of itself cost so very much, but the greater engine power and extra coal that it would take to propel those ships through the ocean might cost considerable.

Mr. SWANSON. Does the Senator mean shields or nets?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am speaking of shields.

Mr. SWANSON. Does the Senator mean armor plate?

Mr. McCUMBER. I was not speaking of armor plate, because armor plate is from 18 inches to 2 or 3 feet in thickness. I am speaking of a shield that may not be more than half an inch thick.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the question has been discussed for a long time in the Navy to determine whether to equip a freighter as a battleship can be equipped. The trouble with a freighter—a merchant ship—is that you can not build it in compartments like a battleship. If you did that, it would not carry much freight. A battleship, consisting of a number of compartments, it would take four or five torpedoes to destroy it. One torpedo would not sink it.

This question has been up. It is not any new question. The merchant marine and also the Navy are trying to determine to what extent it would be well to build merchant ships in compartments like a battleship or a destroyer, and to what extent you can put shields or armor plate on and still enable them to carry freight. The only purpose is to carry freight. It does not do any good for a ship to go to Europe unless it carries corn and wheat and oats. It is not to go there and carry nothing, simply taking the risk without any advantage.

The question has been determined by the most expert board to see to what extent these nets and shields can be applied and still carry freight. If the Lusitania had had compartments she would have been saved like a battleship. The compartments would not have been sunk by one torpedo. This question is being considered by the finest experts in the world. There is no use to make a battleship out of a merchant ship and send it abroad if it can not carry anything, if it can not hold any wheat, when the compartments would practically be all that it could float. The question has been considered in the most minute and scientific way by various boards.

I made this interruption simply to disabuse the Senator's mind. These matters have been considered in the most scientific way by the best shipbuilders and the best experts and the best men connected with the construction of ships.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is easy to make a broad declaration of that kind; all it costs is the little mental energy and the breath that is used in making the declaration; but I have been down before these boards and made some inquiries. I can get the information from the same source the Senator can, and my information from those in authority is that they are not giving the subject of the protection of the merchant ship any real consideration whatever.

Mr. SWANSON. But, Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. But all the energies of your experts and all the inventive genius that you invite to concentrate itself on this matter is along the idea of destroying the submarine—finding the submarine by sound or otherwise. As a Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] said a short time ago, they have finally arrived at the conclusion that they can get ships enough to close in on the submarines at their base. That was nothing new.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the Navy, through the Naval Investigating Board, is investigating both the construction of the torpedo and also the submarine defense, and there is rivalry between the two. The shields were thought at one time to be good, and they were, but, then, with scissors you can cut through, the torpedo carrying it away. There was a contest of the best experts in the Navy to develop the torpedo and at the same time to develop the defense against it, which is a wise way, and the two have gone on together with the best science and the best judgment of the best experts in this country.

I will say to the Senator that Admiral Grant, who is now commander of the submarine fleet, has a special board considering the effectiveness of the submarine and protection against them at the same time. At one time in England nets were very effective, but they soon developed a torpedo that overcame them. Both are going along together. When you develop against the torpedo you must develop the torpedo so as to overcome that defense. The Senator is entirely mistaken when he thinks the Navy of America, of England, and of France, and all for the last two years have not been developed, first, to increase the effectiveness of the torpedo, so that we could use it against enemy ships, and, second, to develop the defense against it. Both have been going on together.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will answer the Senator in a short time. I will first yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I merely desire, in connection with the matter of shields, to state that these devices are not shields. The only things that have been used are nets. Torpedo nets have been used on battleships by Germany and by England. They have proved a failure. One ship carrying those nets was destroyed at the Dardanelles and another was destroyed or badly injured at the Jutland Battle. We have never used these nets. The English Navy has now abandoned them, and it is believed that Germany has done the same thing.

The fatal objection to carrying those nets is that they reduce the speed of the ship from 4 to 5 knots. That would make the merchant ship a helpless victim, of course. The submarines could take their own time of destruction. The net is the only thing in the nature of a shield which has been used by any warship or by any battleship.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am afraid the Senator from Massachusetts, like some of the rest of us, is a little bit behind the times.

Mr. LODGE. I am not behind the times, Mr. President.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, Mr. President, I will not yield.

Mr. LODGE. Very well.

Mr. McCUMBER. But I want to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that as to the matter of which Capt. Smith spoke, he declared that the plate shield can be used with success. I am not an expert, but when the Senator from Massachuetts says these are not shields, that they are simply nets, the Senator is mistaken, or else Capt. Smith, who concurs with the Senator from Massachusetts that nets have gone out, but who says that plate shields can be used, is mistaken and does not know what he is talking about; and I shall not concede that.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I do not mean to be behind the times. Within five minutes I have talked with the Chief of the Bureau of Construction—to make sure that I was not wrong about the nets. He tells me that the net is the only thing that could be denominated a shield. I told him about Capt. Smith being quoted here, and he said that Capt. Smith must have been misunderstood.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am certain that I did not misunderstand Capt. Smith. I am certain that the Senator from Colorado did not misunderstand him, for we talked of the whole subject, and Capt. Smith spoke of shields and of plates. We discussed the question of whether or not the plates could be so made by overlapping that they could be brought up close against the side of the hull when the vessel is passing through a zone that was not dangerous, and could also be extended a sufficient number of feet from the side of the vessel to explode a torpedo without the destruction of the ship. I simply make that statement to assure the Senator from Massachusetts that Capt. Smith undoubtedly knew what he was talking about when he was discussing the shield question with me.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question, if he will permit me.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to inquire of the Senator, with reference to these shields, which I understand to be steel plates half an inch thick, whether they are to extend below the water line; and if so, how far below the water line; whether they are to protect the vessel below the water line or not; and how much of them will be necessarily carried in the water?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am not posing here as an expert or an inventor, but one needs to be neither to know that such a shield would have to go sufficiently far down into the water to protect the hull of a ship from a torpedo which travels from 8 to 16 feet under water.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then, I understand the Senator to advocate a shield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not advocating anything.

Mr. FLETCHER. Well, the Senator seems to be quoting with approval one Capt. Smith. I do not know what Capt. Smith that is.

Mr. LODGE. He is the secretary to the Advisory Board.

Mr. FLETCHER. And he refers to a shield made of steel plate. I was trying to get information from the Senator as to that shield; whether it extends all around the ship and would go as deep in the water as the ship goes, or whether it is only to be a movable affair that can be shifted from one portion of the ship to another. Of course, it stands to reason, if you surround the entire ship with steel plates which are to extend in the water and to draw as much water as the ship draws, you have practically two ships passing through the water; and that, at least, does not appeal to my reason as being a practical proposition.

Mr. McCUMBER. All of those things, Mr. President, could be discussed by the board. Such questions could be handled by them; they could experiment upon the devices and upon their use. If we had a board and ships available, they could make such experiments, but that is not now the case.

I hold in my hand here a little draft—perhaps the department has hundreds—of a plate that is hung by a chain at the side of a vessel with instrumentalities for pushing it out from the hull in a danger zone. It may be that a thickness of a half inch or even perhaps of an inch would not be enough, but a torpedo is not such an enormous object; it, of course, would strike with a certain impact, which could be easily computed by ascertaining its weight and its speed. The force of its impact thus being determined, it could be ascertained whether or not a chisel or anything else could be sent through a single half-inch thickness of steel without exploding the torpedo.

I am not proposing anything; I am simply trying to get an opportunity to allow the inventive genius of the country to concentrate upon one point, and that is the protection of the merchant ships against the submarine torpedo. When I say that practically all of our effort has been along the offensive line rather than the defensive line, I am stating a fact. Almost everything that has been thought out so far is how we shall capture the submarine.

Mr. President, if it is true, as suggested by Capt. Smith, or as suggested by the Senator from Colorado, that we can protect these ships, I do not care if it cost five times as much to operate them, I do not care if they do not travel more than 4 knots an hour, if they can only get across with their freight. That is the important thing.

If that can be done, the only plea of mitigation that can be urged by the administration of each of these countries to an indictment of treason is the plea of partial or total dementia. I can not believe that the administration of this country or any other country has neglected this defense if it has considered that such a shield could be used to defend the vessel. In that respect I agree with the Senator from Virginia. I am doubtful if they have found a shield that will protect vessels from the submarine torpedo; but I am not doubtful that the ingenuity of the world can circumvent the torpedo, if you give it an opportunity to exercise itself under proper conditions. If such a shield can be used, no matter though the cost is five times the cost of the vessel, it would solve this problem and save this war. Why, then, is it that these Senators, including the senior Senator from Florida who hopes that this amendment will be defeated, because it is not sufficiently relevant to an army bill, did not bring before this Senate at the very beginning of this war a bill to commandeer all of the American shipping and by this time have had scores of American merchant ships traversing the seas, bearing food to our allies and perfectly immune from torpedo attack?

But the Senator from Colorado is partially correct. One section of the Navy Department at least does assert that the merchant vessel can be protected. Whether all agree, I am not informed. But the only excuse that has been given is, as indicated in the excerpt from the letter which I have quoted, that the Government has nothing to do with the privately owned merchant ships.

I put this question directly to one of the officials the other day: Is there no means of protecting the merchant ship from the torpedo? He replied: "Yes; unquestionably the ship could be protected by a shield." He was not talking about nets. "Why, then," I asked him, "in the face of this terrible destruction, has the Government failed to act?" Answer: "Because the Government has nothing to do with the privately owned merchant vessels." Again I asked, "Why, then, do not the owners of the vessels themselves protect them." Answer: "Because the cost of the shield and the extra cost of propelling the vessels across the ocean are such that it is cheaper to insure the vessels."

That is the answer. That does not tend to show that it is not possible to protect vessels by shields. Perhaps it is not possible, but I want to give an opportunity to determine whether or not it is possible, and I do not want to be confined to the naval board alone for very good reasons which I gave when speaking on this subject heretofore.

So, Mr. President, if this statement be true that the shipowner can make more money in taking his chances between getting his ship and cargo across the ocean where it is needed or selling it to the insurance company if he fails, we are by our negligence, our criminal negligence, allowing the seas to be swept of merchant marine and our allies to famish for want of the food which we have. Were there nothing at stake but the vessel we might find some excuse, but I repeat that which I have declared many times in this debate, the world's surplus of food products is limited, and we can not feed a large percentage of it to the waves, even though it were possible to keep up our supply of vessels, in spite of the destruction wrought by the submarine; and I think that is impossible.

I then inquired about the use of these shields. The idea of my informant was that the shield should be drawn by ocean tugs upon each side of the vessel. I myself can see objection to that. My informant did not state any objections that he had to it, but I can see an objection in the possible torpedoing of one of the vessels towing the shield. The point, however, Mr. President, is this: If the vessel can be protected by independent shields, drawn by independent power, the same power, it seems to me, might be put in force by larger and more powerful engines in the vessel itself.

I admit, of course, that it would be necessary to have greater coal capacity, greater and more powerful engines, but I am not ready to admit, and I do not admit, from the best expert information I have been able to obtain, that it can not be done at all because of the allegation that it would take all of the space for the additional machinery that would be necessary. We do not need to make battleships out of merchant vessels and supply them with battleship armor.

Mr. President, I desire to call to the attention of the Senate at this point a little model [exhibiting]. It does not amount to anything, perhaps; it may not be feasible at all; but it is a little model of a ship with a shield on each side that could be thrust out when the ship was passing through the danger zone, with machinery for drawing the shield up to fit into the side of the vessel at the bow when in motion, thus making the vessel only a little wider. It would naturally appeal to the ordinary landsman—and I do not claim to be an expert—that it would not take an enormously greater engine to propel through the waves a vessel equipped with this shield. It seems to me that it could be done with very little more power than that furnished ordinarily by the vessel itself. I am not assuming to be an expert, but what I am asking is that experts and those who think they can accomplish something along this line may have an opportunity.

Many of the older Senators here can remember that when the Merrimac was sweeping the seas and no vessel of the Navy could stand against it, we were afraid that the war was lost, but an inventor produced something to combat the Merrimac. It was not produced by a great naval board but by an independent inventor, Ericsson, who brought forth the Monitor and saved the day. He did not go to Navy boards; he acted upon his own initiative in bringing forth that mechanism, and saved the country, or, at least, helped to save it.

I am not claiming, or even conceding, that there has been devised a workable defense shield. All I am claiming is that there are ingenuity and intelligence enough in the country to devise one if you would simply provide a field of operation for the exercise of that ingenuity. We can not do it unless there is ample opportunity to test those appliances which seem to have merit and to determine what suggestions or proposed mechanisms have merit in them. I want a board free from jealousies and outside of bureau ruts to pass on this question. I want new blood infused into these boards.

Mr. President, I repeat, the vital question of this war is not how much it will cost to get food to our allies but whether we can get that food to them at all. If this shield or anything else can protect the ship the order ought to go forth this minute that not a ship shall leave our ports until it can have this shield of protection. This will not delay or hinder any other work. If this shield is not a protection—and it can be easily determined whether it is or not—then give the American people the opportunity to find something that will protect.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do I understand the Senator to state that any of these suggestions or devices by whomsoever offered are turned down without consideration by the Naval Board?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator that I presume at least ninety-nine out of every one hundred of all the devices conceived by individuals would be useless. Many of the devices brought out are sent not to a board created by law at all, but to a board consisting of a certain number of persons, 20 or 30, selected by Secretary Daniels.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The National Defense Board.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is not the National Defense Board, but I think it is called the "consulting board," or something of that kind. Mr. Smith, the expert, is the adviser of that consulting board. They determine, I presume, what devices are not feasible, and others which seem to have promise they refer to the Naval Board. That is all. Then the Naval Board may pass on them or not. They may think that a matter deserves at least some trial, and the Naval Board may think that it does not. The Naval Board declared here a couple of years ago that the submarine was a negligible matter and need not be considered; that the only thing was the great dreadnaught. Now, the Naval Board has been mistaken before and it may be mistaken again.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if my colleague will permit me, not only our own Naval Board so declared with reference to the submarine, but the naval boards of Great Britain and France and Germany so declared. It was my pleasure to vote for the purchase of the first submarine ever bought by this Government, and we did it squarely over the head of the Naval Board of experts, who did not believe it had any practical utility at all as a war weapon.

Mr. McCUMBER. We forced it down their throats.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And yet the greatest sea power in all the world lies dormant and inactive to-day because she can not get at her enemy, forsooth, on account of this little weapon so much despised a few years ago.

If my colleague will permit me, I am going to make this observation, with the Senator's permission: We have decried in this Chamber, over and over, the submarine. We have denounced it upon both sides. We have denounced it as an inhuman weapon, used to the detriment of mankind; but I prophesy that the time may come when that little invention, which sprang like magic from the brain of an American, may protect our country from invasion from without. One hundred and fifty million dollars' worth of submarines would make it absolutely impossible for a foreign foe to land transports of soldiers upon our coasts, and I am not finding any fault with it. I saw it put to its practical test the first time it appeared in the river and in Chesapeake Bay, and I went down in one of the first ones ever perfected; but we laymen, whose judgment was, as the Senator says, negligible, were brushed aside, and the experts determined that that was not a matter to be reckoned with at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to say to the Senator that I am not criticizing the board at all. The Senator and myself, if we were in their positions, would probably get into the same ruts.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not know about that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am in very hearty accord with the position the Senator occupies and has occupied so long, namely, that our greatest endeavor should be put forward to meet successfully the attacks of the submarine; and until that question has been solved, it seems to me that much of our other work is absolutely useless.

I rose, however, to say that I have received, as I suppose other Senators have received, suggestions of inventions for the purpose of destroying the effects of the submarine. I have submitted those, confidently believing that the department was considering them, and have had assurances from the Secretary of the Navy that they had been submitted and were receiving proper consideration. I am somewhat disturbed, however, by what the Senator states, for fear that these apparently insignificant matters, which may hold so much of importance to the country, may not receive their proper consideration at the hands of the Navy Department; and if, to secure it, it is necessary or desirable to create a new board, I think the Senate would be criminal if it neglected the duty of providing such a board or tribunal where these matters could be tried out.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me say to the Senator that I am not asking for a new board. While the language of the amendment denominates it a board created, I am placing on that board men who are already members of the Board of Construction. But, as I stated, I want to get some one else into the board than those men who naturally think only along certain lines. I am not blaming them, but it will do no harm to put other men on a board of that kind. I have given several illustrations of where all of our advancement came from outside sources, and I can give similar illustrations along a hundred different lines of human activity.

In addition to that, I am simply holding this down to one proposition. I want that proposition investigated, and it has not been properly investigated or sufficiently investigated. I am putting the submarine out of the question now, leaving it behind after it has sent its torpedo. I am dealing only with the torpedo, and means of handling that, and that particular branch of the subject has not had adequate consideration.

Mr. President, here is an enemy with which the whole seas can be infested. It is an unseen enemy, under the guidance and control of trained officers and crew. It is almost impossible to know of its approach. We can therefore hope for very meager results from the attempt to capture or avoid its death-dealing missile. But the thing that sinks our ships is not the submarine itself; it is the torpedo that has left the submarine. The torpedo sent on its mission is not guided and controlled by any human mind after it has left the submarine. Its velocity is not irresistible. It travels with its own mechanism at a rate of about 30 miles per hour. It has not the velocity or the impact of a shell fired through the air. The same ingenuity which fashioned and provided its propeller can protect against it. There is enough inventive genius and skill in the United States, earnest and anxious to manifest itself in solving this problem if it can only find the channel through which its devices can be collected, analyzed, and tried out.

Now, I want a board of intelligent men, capable of the broadest possible scope of investigation. No one man of one mind, be he Edison or any other man, is great enough to compass the whole field of that ingenuity which should be brought to bear on this subject. I do not want a board tied down or rutted or obsessed with one single idea or set of ideas along any one particular line of precedents. Of course I want on that board an expert shipbuilder who would know how to apply any mechanism and make it workable and to modify the construction of his vessel to meet the demand. I would want an expert navigator of merchant vessels who would know just the effect of any particular apparatus in the actual navigation of the seas under all conditions in calm or in tempest. I would want expert mechanics schooled in the mechanism used in the great steel and other industries of the country. Then I would want every inventor or mechanic or citizen in the United States who believes that he can present to the board any idea or mechanism, any scheme of protection to the hull of a merchant vessel, to have the opportunity to present his scheme of defense. I would want a board that would weed out that which appears on its face as impracticable and to select those which have a promise of success. Then I would want this board to be clothed with authority to furnish every reasonable facility for trying out those propositions which they deem worthy of consideration, and, finally, to spur into earnest activity the mechanical capabilities. I should offer the most liberal reward to those whose labors might result in a successful defensive mechanism.

Mr. President, I want to read a few excerpts from the Scientific American. These are from Mr. W. H. Fauber:

> Now, if inventions and inventors are such a power in war why is it that our Governments do not follow common-sense business policies and adopt a system which will promptly recompense and award inventors for useful inventions, so that such inventors may proceed with their useful work to the fullest extent of their ability?

And, again:

> Invention and inventors are handicapped because Government officials and business men generally, not being inventors, do not fully understand the subject. The present is the psychological moment for urging long-needed improvements in our patent system and the awakening of our people to a full appreciation of the part invention plays in war and our industries.
> It is with this in view that I have proposed a system of awards, a government board of invention and research and a board of award and equity and certain improvements in our patent system.
>
> Lord Northcliffe says in the New York Tribune, April 16: "There is no time for starting a lot of new experiments with wing and engine design."
>
> The writer has great respect for Lord Northcliffe's opinions. If he means that there is no time for governments to do these things, he is right; otherwise, wrong.
>
> Lord Northcliffe is not an inventor. He does not know, and no man knows, what the inventors of the world can do if given a chance. Neither does any board of Government experts know, and by presuming to advise and dictate in things they do not know about they may cost their country hundreds of thousands of lives and victory in war.

Again:

> Lord Northcliffe says in the New York Times, March 4: "There is a fruitful field for the inventor who can develop types of aeroplanes that can land on ships, start from rough water, and be practical for sea observation."
>
> A practical question I would like to ask is: How fruitful to the inventor may this field be? Does the British or the United States Government offer a million dollars to the inventor for such invention?
>
> Inventors are probably as patriotic as the average person, but it takes a lot of money to develop inventions, and men with money are not financing inventors unless they can see prospective returns. Inventors who have been financed on the patriotic basis by patriotic citizens are scarce.
>
> If Great Britain and the United States should each offer a million-dollar award for the Government rights for such an aeroplane invention this would be a stimulus to inventors and enable some of them to find the money for carrying out their projects.
>
> The quickest and cheapest way for the United States and the British Governments to get a new type of motor, 100 per cent better than motors now in use, is to offer a million-dollar award for the Government rights. It would cost nothing to offer it and it would be worth millions to get it.
> A million award may save a million lives and decide the war.

What is stated with respect to aeroplanes is equally true with respect to this other and greater subject of defending our ships.

Mr. President, Germany was the only country which seemed at the very beginning of this war to recognize the possibilities of the submarine, and she has played a most cunning game. When she promised this Government in 1915 that she would cease her ruthless submarine warfare she never intended to keep that promise. She ceased only because she had not a sufficient number of submarines to accomplish the result in a period of time so short that some new device could not be invented to meet the undersea power. She proceeded immediately to increase that number until she felt she had a sufficient number to sink a million tons of shipping per month and to build rapidly enough to increase the number in active operation every week. And when she was ready to do that she defied the United States. Had we in 1915 performed our duty, had we and Great Britain proceeded along the line of protecting the merchant vessel rather than hunting the sea over to find the submarine and destroy it, we would to-day have been able, in my humble opinion, to defy the submarine. For more than a year I have been trying to get the Senate and the country to realize that this great world war will not be settled by dreadnaughts but by submarines. I am not so certain that it is not too late to save the day. I can only reiterate that this war will be won or lost according as we are able or unable to invent some mechanism to overcome this undersea torpedo; meet the torpedo and Germany can build all the submarines she sees fit. We can produce food enough and munitions enough to supply ourselves and our allies, but we can not produce food enough to fill the ocean.

It is actually exasperating to read the headlines of our papers proclaiming this food crisis and then advocating as the only remedy a race between shipbuilding and ship sinking. And all this in the face of the facts that the sinkings to-day are twenty times greater than could be supplied by the whole world's shipyards. It is astounding that these great world-wide war strategists can not also grasp the fact that even if we were able to keep ship construction up to ship destruction the tonnage of food products sunk would soon deplete the world's surplus. Our allies can not eat ships. We must save for them the cargoes the ocean is now swallowing. And we can save that only by protecting the ships against the torpedoes.

Mr. President, all the morning papers of May 6 printed the solacing news that the submarine menace had been solved. Feeling as I do on this subject, I read with intense engerness the text of the communications, only to find that some of the experiments were promising. Reading further, I found that the tests or trials were directed only toward greater possibilities against the submarine itself and had nothing to do with the defense of the merchant ship against the torpedo. And, finally, the whole thing settled down to the proposition that with a sufficient number of ships of all kinds we could surround the submarine base and bottle them up. That is nothing new to the laity. People not connected with the Navy have been asking ever since this war began why that has not been done. It is somewhat strange that we have just now come to the conclusion that it is feasible.

Now, Mr. President, there is no reason why this amendment should not be adopted. If members of the Committee on Naval Affairs have become so imbued with the spirit—too prevalent, I think, among men of special training or calling—that it is presumptuous to create an independent board to meet that which they have failed to meet, they can at least allow this amendment to go through and the conference can add these members to boards already in existence.

Three things are essential: A wider range of selection; second, a full opportunity to test out proposed appliances; that opportunity has not been provided for by appropriation or otherwise along the line of the protection of the ship itself except the battleship.

And, third and more important, that the thought should be directed toward the protection of the ship itself, rather than that which we have been working on for years, new means to capture the submarine. I have no objection to every possible effort being utilized to devise new instrumentalities of destruction against the submarine itself. I can only say that so far that has proven to be a failure and that the other proposition has not been sufficiently investigated and no provision made for trying out those which a board unbiased would show have any possibility of success.

I am asking this, impressed as I am that we need a greater incentive on the part of our mechanics and our inventors, and opportunities to allow them to exercise their efforts toward securing something that will shield our ships and thereby thwart the torpedo.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I desire to ask him a single question. Great Britain is the chief sufferer from the submarine. Can the Senator tell us whether or not Great Britain has taken any practical steps along the line suggested by the Senator or any similar line to protect her ships?

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course, I assume that they have been investigating, and I assume that they have failed so far. I assume that their naval boards have been investigating, and, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], I know they have tried several things, among which were the nets, which the Senator says have been discarded. But the fact that Great Britain has not accomplished anything, the fact that this country has not attemped to accomplish very much along that line up to the present time, is no reason now when this is the vital question why we should not make every possible effort to meet it just as Ericsson met the Merrimac.

Mr. GALLINGER. My interrogatory did not include that suggestion. It is no reason why we should not try if others have not tried or if others have tried and failed. I quite agree with the Senator on that proposition. I assume that there are thousands of men, the brightest minds of the United States, working on this proposition. I do not know how many, but I think it is safe to say thousands. If the Senator has a better method of having their inventions considered and tested than the method which now prevails in the Navy Department I think he is fully justified in making the argument he has made, and while I was denied the privilege of listening to the Senator during a considerable part of his interesting address, for the reason that I was engaged in committee work, I shall for myself take the opportunity at the earliest possible moment of reading the Senator's speech with a view of being persuaded as to the soundness of his views, if I conclude that they are sound.

This is a very serious matter and we certainly ought to avail ourselves of every possible opportunity to meet the emergency and to save our ships. This very day we have agreed to an appropriation of $750,000,000 for ships, and it would be nothing short of criminal for us to spend that vast amount of money in building ships and have them subjected to this great danger if there is any possible way of protecting them. I agree with the Senator on that point.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is just along that line that we ought to have a board which could pass on everything that they consider worth trying. I do not want to limit it solely to a naval board. I have given my reasons, which I shall not repeat. That is the first proposition.

The second proposition is that I want a board which will have a law back of it authorizing it to expend the money of the Government in making tests of those things which they think are of promise in defending the ship itself. I admit that they are spending enough money and have been doing everything they can along the line of submarine chasers and along the line of warship protection, but I want it along another line, that is the defense of the merchant ships.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I have listened with interest to the address of the Senator from North Dakota. I can not concur in the pessimism which characterizes his address. I do not think that we are in the condition he would have us believe we are in in regard to waging this war. We recognize the difficulties in front of us; we realize that it may be a long and tiresome journey; but I am confident the allies and the United States will conduct the war successfully and to a final triumph. I believe the forces of liberty will win against militarism and autocracy.

The Senator has been impressed with the importance of the submarine menace. There is not a man in England, there is not one in France or in the United States who has not been impressed with that for the last two years or more. Everything has been done that money, science, or genius could do to remedy that evil.

There was no occasion for the Senator in speaking of the menace of the submarine to absolutely discredit the use of dreadnaughts. To-day England would not be fighting submarines if she did not have dreadnaughts to give her control of the surface of the sea. She would have been starved into submission in three months more nearly two years ago. It is the nation that controls the surface of the sea that controls in the long run commerce and trade and traffic, with all its possibilities and with all its prosperity. The submarine is simply a menace to the extent that it prevents nations from controlling the surface of the sea. Consequently England preeminent to-day, though it might be threatened by submarines on the ocean, is independent and in control with her battleships.

Regarding the amendment, the Senator labors under the impression that there are no agencies at work solving the problems that seem to disturb his mind. This matter is not controlled at present entirely by the naval board. In 1915, possibly about two years ago, the Secretary of the Navy created a consulting board of the Navy consisting of 23 men outside of the Navy to study submarines, the manner to fight submarines, and to defend ships of all kinds and character against them. The chairman of that board is Edison, the greatest inventor of his age. The board is composed of 23 of the best experts in America in engineering, in invention, in electricity. They are men who have not the naval view entirely, but men who for the last two years have been giving their time, their genius, and all they know upon inventions and submarines and electricity and engineering and steam in all its phases to solve this menace.

Now, to create a new board to set aside, to nullify, to put condemnation on a board that has been working for two years on this line seems to me to be in the direction not of achievement, not in the direction of wisdom, not in the direction of accomplishing something. They have the money; they have the men; and they have the means. The board consists of 23 of the best inventors, engineers, and mechanics, and the best men who possibly can be selected. The only result of the Senator's amendment would be that 4 out of the 23 would be selected and be given a salary of $5,000 each. These men have been serving day and night, and I wish to say that they are investigating the question in the most scientific way. What they have accomplished up to this time has been encouraging until the new submarine danger, more forcible, that Germany has invented. The smaller submarines were very well handled until the new submarine was increased in power and potency and force in the last six months. These men have been working now to displace them. To select 4 men to commence now and authorize them to undertake the work in which these 23 men, who are not Navy men, have been engaged, it would seem to me, is not wise or proper administration, and it would not accomplish the result nearly as well. If the Senator will look over this list of 23 men, and if he had to select 4 to constitute the board he names, I think he would select 4 of those 23.

More than that, combined with this is the Navy Department of America, of England, of France, and Italy spending all the money with the best genius of the Navy Department, to do what? To try to increase the potency of the submarine and at the same time to do everything they can to defend ships against them.

There is no doubt the Senator's suggestion is right as to making a fortress of a ship and surrounding it with armor. You could surround it with defenses so that a torpedo could not penetrate it, but it would cease to be a ship; it could not navigate; it would be a fortress.

On the question of trying to furnish shields and nets, I will say that nets are used now by Italy in transport ships in taking soldiers to Greece. They are used very effectively on ships of small size, but in rough seas they have not been very encouraging. One of the best defenses they have had against the submarine is the rapidity of the ship and its ability to maintain its course. To the extent that you put on a net or an armor to that extent you destroy that means of dealing with them. One reason why the merchant marine is not as defensible against the submarine as a battleship or a destroyer is due to the method of construction. A battleship is constructed with armor. The more armor you put on the merchant ship the less freight she can carry. You could put armor on the ship until she could not carry any wheat or cotton or corn or oats, and consequently would be useless as a merchant vessel.

In addition to that, you do not build merchant ships with as many compartments as they have in battleships. Take a battleship or a destroyer over 400 feet long and it would take two or three torpedoes to destroy it. If you destroy one compartment and the water enters it the ship can still float. The minute you increase the compartments in the ship you reduce its freight ability; it will carry less freight; it is less useful as a merchant ship.

That problem is being discussed and is being solved and is being experimented with by the consulting board, by the Navy Department, by the Shipping Board, and by persons, civil and naval, in England, France, and Italy. The problem will finally be solved. They have experiments and inventions which are very encouraging, indeed. It is only a question of time when, I believe, the submarine menace will be settled to the satisfaction of England, the United States, and all the allies.

Now, to create a new board, to commence where these men began two years ago on an entire new problem and set aside the experiments and investigations that have been made, seems to me to be ill-timed, and it would not accomplish the result sought to be accomplished by the Senator from North Dakota.

In addition to that, Mr. President, Admiral Grant, who is charged with the submarine flotilla, has a board of naval experts working with the consulting board composed entirely of civilians. They have been for months and months experimenting, practically, theoretically, scientifically, with the defense that is to be made by merchant ships and by battleships against torpedoes and submarines. They have considered the extent to which a torpedo can be deflected by electricity or other forces when it is started on its pathway of destruction. These matters have been experimented with by those people for the last two years, scientifically, theoretically, practically, and it seems to me to be ill-advised to create a new board which would take 30 days, possibly, before it could commence to do what these gentlemen commenced doing a year or two years ago.

With the forces that are at work, every department of the Government, the Navy and the consulting board, and all the people of the country united in an effort to meet this menace, it seems to me it will be met. The inventions are encouraging on all lines. I believe to have the investigation continued as it is now and not start a new board to commence work which has been investigated by the best talent and genius in this country for the last two years is the best course to pursue.

There is not a man who has an invention to protect a battleship or to protect a merchant ship and to fight submarines or to increase the potency of submarines who does not have an opportunity to go before these two boards, the board in the Navy Department, composed entirely of naval experts, and the Consulting Board, composed of 23 civilians who are experts with inventions on this question, and they have been studying it ever since 1915. If you can have any other avenue of investigation exceeding that I should like to see it devised.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will pardon me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. To show the enormous number of suggestions that we are receiving, I was informed this morning by a gentleman who had business before the department and has a device by which he believes the submarines could be made absolutely ineffective that the department has now 5,000 suggestions coming to it from every source, and all of them that have the least merit are under investigation.

Mr. SWANSON. I suppose I have had as many suggestions made to me as any Senator or Representative. I have never seen any disinclination on the part of the consulting board and the Navy to give them full investigation and test.

It seems to me, with the encouragement we have and the encouragement that comes from the most reliable source, the wise thing to do is to continue the boards we have at present, composed of the most scientific men in America, both naval and civilian. I hope the amendment will not carry.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know that has been the Senator's hope, Mr. President. The Senator says we created a board in 1915 that has been considering this submarine question, and then he proceeds to state what that board, consisting of 23 members, with Mr. Edison at the head of it, is doing; and he further states that that board has all the money it needs. He says it has all the money and all the means that are needed. Where did the board get that money? Your appropriation gave that board $25,000 to cover its clerk hire.

Mr. SWANSON. That is to pay their expenses. They have in addition to that ordnance for ship construction in the Navy.

Mr. McCUMBER. This board has nothing to do with that, Mr. President. The board the Senator is speaking of has $25,000, and it has not a cent more. The other appropriation the Senator is speaking of for building ships applies to the general board, the board of construction. That has all the money it needs; we will admit that; but this consulting board was not created by anything we did. Secretary Daniels asked certain persons if they would act as an advisory board or commission, and he picked out 23 of them. It was not created by any law at all, but we gave it vitality by providing that it should have $25,000 at its disposal. Has that board as a board expended one penny in experimentation?

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. Take the suggestion of the Senator about trying shields or nets to protect merchant ships. This board of the Navy Department can try shields or nets or armor plate. They can be put there under the control of this board. They can give them torpedoes to try and see whether they will penetrate them or not. Is there any use of having any more appropriations to build submarines to fire torpedoes or to buy armor plate when the Navy Department can furnish all these experiments under the control of a board of scientists?

Mr. McCUMBER. If that argument had come from some farmer out in my State I would not have been surprised, but coming from the acting chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I am surprised.

This consulting board does not do anything. Your General Naval Board does not turn over to it anything. There is just one man with his little coterie who is being utilized at all, and that is Mr. Edison. What is done? These propositions are submitted to this consulting board. What do they do with them? They have their advisory counsel, Mr. Smith, and they look them over, and if they consider any one of them worth investigation they send them to your Naval Board, and the Naval Board passes on them. This consulting board does not pass on anything except to determine what there is of promise and what has no promise, and send the former to the general board.

I called the attention of the Senator to a letter from an inventor who believed that he had something in which there was at least some merit. I do not know whether there is any merit in it or not. He presented it to this board, and it was referred to the other board, and when he went to it they told him they had nothing to do with the merchant vessels, that they were privately owned, and if he had an invention that would protect those ships he ought to take it to the owners.

Does the Senator think that that gentleman was telling an untruth? It is the same information that comes from all of them. They are referred to this one final board by the board for whom we appropriated $25,000. Of course they have no money; that $25,000 they can not use for experimentation; they could not issue checks against the Treasury. I will assure the Senator he can not find a single voucher for a dollar that has been turned over to those people to experiment with.

Mr. Edison has been working along the line of ascertaining the whereabouts of a submarine by sound. Undoubtedly he is a great expert. He may find some way of detecting the location of a submarine 1, 2, or 5, or even 10 miles away. There is another thing that has been considered, and that is some way of deflecting, through magnetism or electricity, a torpedo. Stop a moment to think of the probable weight of one of those torpedoes and the force with which it travels and its speed. I think it would take something of a magnet to deflect it and turn it out of its course when heading for a ship. None of them have accomplished anything along that line, and there is no claim that they will accomplish anything. When you get right down to the wonderful thing that is going to be accomplished, as stated by the Senator, you get right down to the same old proposition we have had for several years about surrounding the submarine base. If you have ships enough, you can run up along the coast of Norway into Norwegian waters inside the 3-mile limit and around which the submarines sneak under the waters, and by fencing them in you may be able to meet them in that way. Well, that has not been demonstrated yet, if it ever will be. In the meantime give the American inventors, the American people, an opportunity of bringing forth something along the line of the defense of the ship at the same time that you are working along these other lines.

The reading of the bill was resumed at section 4, page 2, line 7.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, in section 4, page 2, line 10, after the word "discretion," to insert "with the advice and consent of the Senate," and in line 12, after the word "lieutenant," to insert the word "commander," so as to read:

SEC. 4. Additional commissioned officers in the Navy and Marine Corps, based upon the temporary increases herein authorized in the number of enlisted men, shall be temporarily appointed by the President, in his discretion, with the advice and consent of the Senate, not above the grades and ranks of lieutenant commander in the line and staff of the Navy and major in the Marine Corps, the distribution in said grades and ranks to be made in accordance with the provisions of the act of August 29, 1916.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. On page 2, line 22, after the word "lieutenant," I move to insert the word "commander," as was done in line 12. It is a typographical omission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, page 2, line 22, after the word "lieutenant," it is proposed to insert "commander," so as to read:

And that there shall be no permanent or temporary appointments in or permanent or temporary promotions to any grade or rank above that of lieutenant commander in the Navy—

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, in section 4, page 3, line 2, after the word "war," to strike out the words "and existing" and to insert the article "the"; in the same line, after the word "deficiency," to insert "existing prior to the passage of this act"; and in line 6, after the word "may," to insert "also," so as to read:

Provided further, That, during the period of the present war, the deficiency existing prior to the passage of this act in the total number of commissioned officers of the Navy and Marine Corps authorized by the act of August 29, 1916, may also be supplied by temporary appointments in the lowest grades and by temporary promotions to all other grades until a sufficient number of officers shall be available for regular appointment or promotion in accordance with existing law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 8, to strike out:

SEC. 6. That during the period of the present war the computations to be made by the Secretary of the Navy as prescribed by the act of August 29, 1916, shall be made semiannually as of July 1 and January 1 of each year and at such other times as he may deem necessary; and the Board of Rear Admirals, for selection for promotion prescribed in said act, may be convened at such times as the exigencies of the service may require.

And insert:

SEC. 6. That during the period of the present war the computations to be made by the Secretary of the Navy as prescribed by the act of August 29, 1916, shall be made semiannually as of July 1, and January 1 of each year and at such other times as he may deem necessary; and the Board of Rear Admirals for selection for promotion prescribed in said act may be convened at such times as the exigencies of the service may require, and shall recommend for promotion such number of officers as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe; and if nine rear admirals can not be convened without injury to the service six rear admirals may constitute the board and four of the members must concur in the recommendations instead of six, as prescribed in said act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. As a substitute for section 11, as printed in the bill, I move the amendment which I send to the desk. The substitute provision merely allows 17 additional clerks in the paymaster's department. No provision was made for them in section 11 as now contained in the bill, and the increase in the authorized strength of the Marine Corps to 30,000 requires these additional clerks in connection with the work of the supply department. I have a very urgent letter from the Secretary of the Navy on that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, after line 12, it is proposed to strike out:

SEC. 11. That the appointment of 30 marine gunners and 30 quartermaster's clerks, additional to the number now prescribed by law, is hereby authorized, such appointments to be made in the manner now provided by law.

And insert:

SEC. 11. That the appointment of 30 marine gunners, 30 quartermaster's clerks, and 9 clerks to assistant paymasters, additional to the number now prescribed by law, and the temporary appointment of 8 clerks to assistant paymasters for the war is hereby authorized, such appointments to be made in the manner now provided by law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, in section 12, page 8, at the beginning of line 19, to insert "with the advice and consent of the Senate," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 12. That the temporary appointments and promotions herein authorized shall be made by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the beginning of section 15, page 9, line 16, to strike out:

SEC. 15. That on and after May 1, 1917, the pay of all enlisted men of the Navy, during the continuance of the war, be, and it is hereby, increased $15 a month over and above the rates of pay proper as fixed by law for times of peace.

And insert:

That commencing June 1, 1917, and continuing until the termination of the war, all enlisted men of the Navy of the United States in active service whose base pay does not exceed $21 per month shall receive an increase of $10 per month; those whose base pay is over $21 and does not exceed $24 per month, an increase of $8 per month; those whose base pay is over $24 and less than $45 per month, an increase of $6 per month; and those whose base pay is $45 or more per month, an increase of $5 per month: Provided, That the increases of pay herein authorized shall not enter into the computation of continuous-service pay.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 15. That commencing June 1, 1917, and continuing until the termination of the war, all enlisted men of the Navy of the United States in active service whose base pay does not exceed $21 per month shall receive an increase of $10 per month; those whose base pay is over $21 and does not exceed $24 per month, an increase of $8 per month; those whose base pay is over $24 and less than $45 per month, an increase of $6 per month; and those whose base pay is $45 or more per month, an increase of $5 per month: Provided, That the increases of pay herein authorized shall not enter into the computation of continuous-service pay: Provided, That during the continuance of the war, warrant officers, petty officers, and enlisted men of the United States Coast Guard shall receive the same rates of pay as are or may hereafter be prescribed for corresponding grades or ratings and length of service in the Navy.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I should like the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in connection with this amendment. I do not know whether the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has noticed the change provided for in this bill. It does not conform with the provision which I understand is contained in the conference report just made by the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee. It seems to me that there ought to be some agreement which would give the men serving in the Army and the Navy exactly the same rates of pay during the continuance of the war.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I took the conference report on the Army bill, furnished me by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, and submitted it to Admiral Palmer, of the Bureau of Navigation. He assured me that the increase provided in the amendment now under consideration is precisely the increase provided for in the conference report on the Army bill. I think we all agree that the increases ought to be the same in both branches of the service. The only difference is that the base pay in the Army is slightly less than in the Navy, there being a difference of a few dollars. The amendment gives the same increase of pay to the enlisted men of the Navy as is provided for soldiers in the Army, but because of a slight variance in the pay of the enlisted strength of the Army and the Navy there is a little discrepancy. Admiral Palmer, however, assures me that this amendment provides precisely the same increase for the enlisted men in the Navy that is proposed for the enlisted men of the Army.

Mr. WEEKS. Has Admiral Palmer seen the conference report which has just been made to the Senate?

Mr. SWANSON. I gave him the copy of the conference report that was handed to me by the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee. Admiral Palmer and Admiral Watts then retired from the room where the committee was in conference, took that agreement, and suggested this provision as being identical with the proposed increase for the enlisted men of the Army, the intention being to give precisely the same increase to the enlisted men of the Navy as is given to the enlisted men of the Army.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the larger base pay of the enlisted men in the Navy will give to them under the amendment larger pay than is received by the enlisted men in the Army.

Mr. SWANSON. The base pay in the Navy has been $17.60, while that of the Army has been $15, the difference being that the Army provides more clothing for its men than does the Navy. In the Navy a man only receives his first suit. So, taking into consideration this circumstance, the base pay has been considered practically the same. The difference has existed for years, but, taking that into account, we have made the same increase on base pay.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not go into it with any of the department officials, but I gave the acting chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs a copy of the agreement reached by the conferees on the Army bill. Since then the plan of increase proposed in the conference report on the Army bill has not been changed, and I assumed that the matter would be investigated by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. I repeat that while the Naval Committee was in session I went to the Senator from Oregon, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and asked him to give me a statement as to what had been agreed on as to the increase of the pay of enlisted men in the Army, which he did. I then sent for Admiral Palmer, of the Bureau of Navigation, and Admiral Watts, the Judge Advocate of the Navy, and told them to take the provision in the Army bill and draft an amendment that would provide exactly the same increase for the Navy. The amendment which now appears in the bill is what was submitted by them.

I wish to say that if the Army bill as finally passed should provide a different rate of pay than that contained in the conference report, while the bill now pending is in conference I will, in so far as I am able, see that the same increase is given to the enlisted men of the Navy that is given to the enlisted men of the Army.

Mr. WEEKS. I hope the Senator will have an eye to that and be sure that the same rates of pay are provided for men in similar grades in the two branches of the service.

Mr. SWANSON. That is my purpose, as well as the purpose of the Naval Committee.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. CALDER. Then, I understand that under the terms of this amendment the minimum pay for enlisted men in the Navy is $27.60?

Mr. SWANSON. The base pay will be $27.60.

Mr. CALDER. That is the minimum?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; that is the base pay.

Mr. CALDER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to section 4, page 2, which contains the following language:

SEC. 4. Additional commissioned officers in the Navy and Marine Corps, based upon the temporary increases herein authorized in the number of enlisted men, shall be temporarily appointed by the President, in his discretion, with the advice and consent of the Senate, not above the grades and ranks of lieutenant commander in the line and staff of the Navy and major in the Marine Corps.

It has been reported to me that certain officers in the Navy claim that would stall and check all promotions in the higher grades. I should like to know how that is.

Mr. SWANSON. I think that is taken care of, as the Senator will see if he will read further on. What he has read relates to temporary appointments. If the Senator will read further on, he will find from line 16, on page 2, to line 10, on page 3, language which I think will entirely obviate any misconception. The number of officers in the Navy is based on 4 per cent of the authorized enlisted strength of the Navy. Then, the apportionment of officers among the different grades is based upon the actual number of officers on the active list. On a strength of 87,000 enlisted men there is a deficiency of 995, nearly a thousand, ensigns and junior lieutenants, and the Navy does not have as many admirals, captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders as it otherwise would have, for the number of such officers is only a certain percentage of 4 per cent of the authorized strength.

Mr. NELSON. What about the Marine Corps?

Mr. SWANSON. In the Marine Corps the apportionment is based on 4 per cent in the same way.

This bill permits the officers temporarily appointed to be counted in computing the number of officers in the different grades and will allow the number of admirals to be increased to 1 per cent of the total number of officers and the number of captains to 7 per cent. This will permit temporarily, until the Navy has all permanent officers, a complete reorganization of the Navy during this war, with admirals, captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders based on an authorized strength of 87,000 men.

Mr. NELSON. Now, the bill proposes to increase the Marine Corps up to 30,000, I believe?

Mr. SWANSON. Thirty thousand.

Mr. NELSON. What effect will this provision—that no one higher than the rank of major can be appointed—have upon the appointment of officers in the higher grades?

Mr. SWANSON. There can not be any appointments in higher grades than major on account of this.

Mr. NELSON. I mean, on officers already in the service?

Mr. SWANSON. They will continue in their present positions, but no appointments can be made temporarily higher than major. That was done because the Marine Corps will not move like an army of 30,000, with divisional commanders, some of them major generals. It will move in battalions, in regiments, and smaller divisions. If it were going to be an army and move as 30,000 men, you might as well transfer it to the Army and make it such. Consequently, we have allowed them to appoint officers temporarily as high as majors, on account of the number of battalions that will be used for the marine service.

Mr. NELSON. Then there will be no such thing as lieutenant colonels and colonels?

Mr. SWANSON. They will keep their present numbers. This is a temporary arrangement.

Mr. NELSON. But there will be no such thing for this new corps?

Mr. SWANSON. Not beyond 17,400; there will not be any permanent appointments to the rank of colonel, lieutenant colonel, or brigadier general.

Mr. NELSON. They have nothing, then, in this increase of the Marine Corps of any higher grade than major?

Mr. SWANSON. That is true.

Mr. NELSON. Nothing higher?

Mr. SWANSON. Nothing higher.

Mr. NELSON. In doubling the Marine Corps force?

Mr. SWANSON. In doubling the Marine Corps force, because we thought it was temporary, and then, in addition to that, the Marine Corps is not contemplated to move as an entirety.

Mr. NELSON. The old service is to continue to have its generals, its colonels, and its lieutenant colonels, while this new addition is to have nothing of the kind. Is that it?

Mr. SWANSON. Nothing higher than a major; that is true.

Mr. NELSON. They are to have nothing higher than majors?

Mr. LODGE. They are temporary appointments.

Mr. SWANSON. They are temporary appointments up as high as majors. It is done for the simple reason that the Marine Corps division of 30,000 men of an army must be organized in time as a division. Now, it is not contemplated that the Marine Corps will be in a division of 30,000 men, or operate as a division. It never would operate in that way. We have created a brigadier general, but these additions in enlistment, it is supposed, will work usually in battalions and small detachments, for which we now furnish majors.

Mr. NELSON. Are you not to have any colonels or lieutenant colonels?

Mr. SWANSON. We have enough, we think, to answer for all large movements at present for all large commands. For 17,400 men they have brigadier generals, colonels, and lieutenant colonels. Now, this increase to 30,000 men, it is expected, will move in small detachments not higher than battalions. It is not expected to make an army of it. Consequently, we felt satisfied that promotions to major would be sufficient to answer this purpose.

Mr. NELSON. In other words, you do not conceive that this new force will have any higher organization than a major's command?

Mr. SWANSON. It may have.

Mr. NELSON. You are not to have any regiments or battalions?

Mr. SWANSON. It is expected that they will move mostly in detachments, where majors will be sufficient.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, where the word "war" occurs, in line 9, page 10, I should like to insert the word "present," so that it will read "the present war."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 9, before the word "war," it is proposed to insert the word "present," so that it will read "during the continuance of the present war."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to the fact that on page 7, line 14, page 9, line 22, and page 2, line 5, the same word should be inserted.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to have the same word inserted there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 14, before the word "war," it is proposed to insert the words "the present."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 22, it is proposed to insert the word "present" before the word "war."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 5, before the word "war," it is proposed to insert the word "present."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, after line 13, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 16. That the President is hereby authorized, whenever in his judgment a sufficient national emergency exists, to transfer to the service and jurisdiction of the War Department, or of the Navy Department, such vessels, equipment, stations, and personnel of the Coast and Geodetic Survey as he may deem to the best interest of the country, and after such transfer all expenses connected therewith shall be defrayed out of the appropriations for the department to which transfer is made: Provided, That such vessels, equipment, stations, and personnel shall be returned to the Coast and Geodetic Survey when such national emergency ceases, in the opinion of the President, and nothing in this act shall be construed as transferring the Coast and Geodetic Survey or any of its functions from the Department of Commerce except in time of national emergency and to the extent herein provided: Provided further, That any of the personnel of the Coast and Geodetic Survey who may be transferred as herein provided shall, while under the jurisdiction of the War Department or Navy Department, have proper military status and shall be subject to the laws, regulations, and orders for the government of the Army or Navy, as the case may be, in so far as the same may be applicable to persons whose retention permanently in the military service of the United States is not contemplated by law: And provided further, That the President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the field officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, who are now officially designated assistants and aids, as follows: Officers now designated assistants and receiving a salary of $2,000 or more per annum shall be appointed hydrographic and geodetic engineers; officers now designated assistants and receiving a salary of $1,200 or greater but less than $2,000 per annum shall be appointed junior hydrographic and geodetic engineers; officers now designated aids shall be appointed aids: Provided, That no person shall be appointed aid or shall be promoted from aid to junior hydrographic and geodetic engineer or from junior hydrographic and geodetic engineer to hydrographic and geodetic engineer until after passing a satisfactory mental and physical examination conducted in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce, except that the President is authorized to nominate for confirmation the assistants and aids in the service on the date of the passage of this act.

Nothing in this act shall reduce the total amount of pay and allowances they were receiving at the time of transfer. While actually employed in active service under direct orders of the War Department or of the Navy Department members of the Coast and Geodetic Survey shall receive the benefit of all provisions of laws relating to disability incurred in line of duty or loss of life.

When serving with the Army or Navy the relative rank shall be as follows:

Hydrographic and geodetic engineers receiving $4,000 or more shall rank with and after colonels in the Army and captains in the Navy.

Hydrographic and geodetic engineers receiving $3,000 or more but less than $4,000 shall rank with and after lieutenant colonels in the Army and commanders in the Navy.

Hydrographic and geodetic engineers receiving $2,500 or more but less than $3,000 shall rank with and after majors in the Army and lieutenant commanders in the Navy.

Hydrographic and geodetic engineers receiving $2,000 or more but less than $2,500 shall rank with and after captains in the Army and lieutenants in the Navy.

Junior hydrographic and geodetic engineers shall rank with and after first lieutenants in the Army and lieutenants (junior grade) in the Navy.

Aids shall rank with and after second lieutenants in the Army and ensigns in the Navy.

And nothing in this act shall be construed to affect or alter their rates of pay and allowances when not assigned to military duty as hereinbefore mentioned.

The Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of Commerce shall jointly prescribe regulations governing the duties to be performed by the Coast and Geodetic Survey in time of war, and for the cooperation of that service with the War and Navy Departments in time of peace in preparation for its duties in war, which regulations shall not be effective unless approved by each of the said Secretaries, and included therein may be rules and regulations for making reports and communications between the officers or bureaus of the War and Navy Departments and the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Also the following, as a new section

SEC. 17. That nothing contained in the act of August 29, 1916, shall operate to disturb the relative position of officers in the Medical Corps with reference to precedence or promotion, but all such officers otherwise qualified shall be advanced in rank with or ahead of officers in said corps who were their juniors on the date of said act.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill what that means?

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, in August, 1915, officers took precedence according to the date of their commission. Prior to that time officers took precedence according to their length of service. In the act of last year we provided that officers in the Medical and Staff Corps should be promoted with their running mates in the line. Having changed from 1915 and prior to that as to when their precedence should be—one time according to length of service and the other from date of commission—it resulted that some officers who were junior in the Medical Corps were being advanced, on account of their running mates, prior to senior officers in the Medical Corps. This provision simply provides that no junior in the Medical Corps, on account of his running mate or the change of law from length of service to date of commission shall be advanced over a senior. If the Senator will read the language he will see that it gets rid of that difficulty clearly.

Mr. WEEKS. Does that apply to other Staff Corps as well?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not think there is any provision in other Staff Corps—they are so small—that would operate to do that, but nothing was brought to our attention by way of complaint except the fact that junior medical officers were getting ahead of senior medical officers, and it was put in for that purpose.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator having charge of the bill. The increase in the Marine Corps is from 17,400 to 30,000?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; from 17,400 to 30,000.

Mr. KELLOGG. And, as I understood the explanation made by the Senator in response to the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], there are to be no officers appointed for this additional force above the rank of major?

Mr. LODGE. No temporary appointments?

Mr. SWANSON. No temporary appointments higher than the rank of major. It does not interfere with the permanent appointments under existing law.

Mr. KELLOGG. I know; but there will be no increase of officers?

Mr. SWANSON. Except so far as existing law will permit promotions; but not on account of this increase of force, because it is contemplated that it will be a temporary force that will cease as soon as the war is over.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then, under the present law, promotions can be made for the creation of more brigadier generals, for instance?

Mr. SWANSON. One more, possibly, could be created; yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. Can there be any more colonels or lieutenant colonels?

Mr. SWANSON. Under existing law there might be three more colonels.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then for the 30,000 men you will have only four more officers higher than the rank of major than for the 17,000?

Mr. SWANSON. There will be more lieutenant colonels promoted, as provided by the act of last year.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, for those higher grades, both in the Navy and in the Marine Corps, there are abundant officers in the line now to meet the demands of the increases to 150,000 and 30,000, respectively. The only increase needed is in the lower grades.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then there are more of the higher officers to-day than are needed for the 17,000 men?

Mr. SWANSON. No; if the Senator will permit me, it is not contemplated to assemble the Marine Corps in any larger force than ten or twelve thousand men. It is not to be in a division, like an Army division. Thirty thousand men in an Army division must have a major general. Some of them requested that a major general should be created. The committee did not think there was any use of having a major general when it was not contemplated to assemble them in a number of 30,000. They help man the ships, make up expeditions, and move in small detachments; so we thought that to allow the appointment of majors, with the increase that would naturally come from colonels, lieutenant colonels, and brigadier generals, would be ample to man the force with officers.

Mr. KELLOGG. Was that the recommendation to the committee by the Navy Department?

Mr. SWANSON. The naval bill, as prepared by Mr. PADGETT and myself, was sent to the Secretary of the Navy, and he wrote a letter recommending the bill prepared on this line, except that we limited it to captains. We did not have any higher promotions than captains, and the House put it up as high as major. That was recommended by the Secretary of the Navy—having the temporary appointments not to exceed captains.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then the Secretary of the Navy did recommend substantially this provision?

Mr. SWANSON. He recommended the provisions contained in this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment just stated by the Secretary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. It is also proposed to insert the following on page 14, following line 4, as a new section:

SEC. 18. That in addition to the provisions of existing law, the President be, and he is hereby, further authorized to designate six officers of the Navy for the command of fleets or subdivisions thereof and, after being so designated, from the date of assuming such command until relinquishment thereof, not more than three of such officers shall each have the rank and pay of an admiral, and the others shall each have the rank and pay of a vice admiral; and the grades of admiral and vice admiral are hereby authorized and continued for the purpose of this act: Provided, That the pay of an admiral shall be $10,000 and the pay of a vice admiral $9,000 per annum: Provided further, That in time of peace officers for the command of fleets and subdivisions thereof, as herein authorized, shall be designated from among the rear admirals on the active list of the Navy: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall create any vacancy in any grade in the Navy or increase the total number of officers authorized by law: Provided further, That when an officer with the rank of admiral or vice admiral is detached from the command of a fleet or subdivision thereof, as herein authorized, he shall return to his regular rank in the list of officers of the Navy and shall thereafter receive only the pay and allowances of such rank: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be held or construed as amending or repealing the provisions of sections 1434, 1463, and 1464 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

That the provision in the act approved March 3, 1915, for the designation of commanders in chief of certain fleets with the rank of admiral and for the designation of officers second in command of such fleets with the rank of vice admiral be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the first part of that amendment is not exactly what we wish. I should like to strike out the words "in addition to the provisions of existing law," because the existing law provides for three admirals and three vice admirals, and this would provide for six. The purpose of this amendment is not to increase the number of admirals or vice admirals, but it is simply to change the existing law, which says we shall have one admiral of the Atlantic Fleet, one of the Pacific Fleet, and one of the Asiatic Fleet, limiting it to the same number of admirals and vice admirals, but eliminating the geographical distinction in reference to them. If it were to read, "in addition to the provisions of existing law," it would simply be construed to mean that it creates these in addition to those. So I should like to strike out the words "in addition to the provisions of existing law."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I want to offer an amendment to that section, which I suppose is in order as long as it is a committee amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; it is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "act," in line 14, page 14, it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the selection under the provisions of this section shall be made from the grades of rear admiral or captain on the active list of the Navy.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I may take that into conference. It simply extends the selection of these officers to the position of captain. It is limited now to rear admirals.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I am not willing that the Senator shall say that he will "take that into conference" in that tone.

Mr. SWANSON. I did not mean any particular tone. I simply meant that I had no objection to it. I do not know; I might not antagonize it, but I felt that I am not prepared to say now whether it would be wise or not. It would introduce a great deal of friction to take admirals from captains and not simply from the grade of rear admiral. Under this bill we will have about 30 to select from, and I have not given the matter sufficient consideration to say whether the admirals ought to be selected from the grade of captain or not. Under the present law the selection is limited to rear admirals. I will ask the Senator if that is not the substance of his amendment?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the substance of my amendment is that it limits the President's selection to the grades of rear admiral and captain. As the amendment proposed by the committee reads, there is no limitation. He could appoint a rear admiral from the grade of commander if he wished, or lieutenant, or ensign.

Mr. SWANSON. That was left out here. It was intended to say "rear admiral."

Mr. WEEKS. That you do in time of peace, but not in time of war. I am not sure that you ought to in time of war, but I think in making the selection the President may well be limited to the grades of rear admiral and captain.

Mr. SWANSON. In time of war, I understand one of the sections of this bill that we did not repeal gives the President authority to name almost any man as commander of a fleet, and he must be respected and obeyed as such, except that the designation would not give him the pay.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not think there has ever been in the history of the Navy a case where a man has been given command of a fleet who did not have the rank of a captain; and I think, without any disparagement to anyone, we can limit the grades from which the selections are made to those of rear admiral and captain, which will cover at least 75 officers. If we can not get competent men to command the fleets from that large number, the Navy is certainly in bad condition.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to the amendment being adopted. I will consider it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I offer as a committee amendment, to be known as section 19, the matter which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the bill, a new section, as follows:

SEC. 19. That section 44 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909, as amended by an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1917, be, and is hereby, amended by adding the following to said section:

"Provided, That offenses hereunder committed within the Canal Zone or within any defensive sea arena which the President is authorized to establish by said section, shall be cognizable in the District Court of the Canal Zone, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to hear and determine all such cases arising under said section and to impose the penalties therein provided for the violation of any of the provisions of said section."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. 20. That hereafter all laws relating to the examination of officers of the Navy for promotion shall be construed to apply to the regular advancement of staff officers to higher ranks on the active list the same as though such advancements in rank were promotions to higher grades: Provided, That examinations for such staff officers shall not be required except for such regular advancements in rank.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. Now, I have one more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia offers a further amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the bill, a new section, as follows:

SEC. 21. That during the continuance of the present war an extra allowance of 1 ounce of coffee or cocoa, 2 ounces of sugar, 4 ounces of hard bread or its equivalent, and 4 ounces of preserved meat or its equivalent shall be allowed to enlisted men of the deck force when standing night watches between 8 o'clock p. m. and 8 o'clock a. m.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I offer an amendment in the shape of a new section at the end of the bill, which I ask the Senator from Virginia if he will accept.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the bill, a new section, which will be section 22, as follows:

That the provisions of section 114 of an act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States, approved March 4, 1909 (35 Stat., 1109), shall not apply during the present war with Germany to enrollments by Members of Congress in the Navy, including the Marine Corps and Naval Reserve Force.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, perhaps I had better explain this; and I ask to have inserted as a part of my remarks section 114, to which I refer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

The section referred to is as follows:

SEC. 114. Whoever, being elected or appointed a Member of or Delegate to Congress, or a Resident Commissioner, shall, after his election or appointment and either before or after he has qualified, and during his continuance in office, directly or indirectly, himself, or by any other person in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account, undertake, execute, hold, or enjoy, in whole or in part, any contract or agreement made or entered into in behalf of the United States by any officer or person authorized to make contracts on its behalf shall be fined not more than $3,000. All contracts or agreements made in violation of this section shall be void; and whenever any sum of money is advanced by the United States in consideration of any such contract or agreement it shall forthwith be repaid; and in case of failure or refusal to repay the same when demanded by the proper officer of the department under whose authority such contract or agreement shall have been made or entered into suit shall at once be brought against the person so failing or refusing and his sureties for the recovery of the money so advanced.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I will simply say that that amendment would permit Members of Congress to enlist as seamen in the Navy. Section 114 or the act of March 4, 1909, which prevents any contract being made between a Member of Congress and the Government in any way has been construed by the Judge Advocate General of the Navy to prevent any enlistment of a Member of Congress, because enlistment is a contract. This would not affect the situation as to officers, because under the Constitution no Member of Congress could be an officer without the vacation of his seat. That is the purpose of the amendment. I will not comment on the decision of the Judge Advocate General.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I accept that amendment, and think it ought to be adopted. Members of Congress who desire to serve in the Navy should be permitted to do so, and I take pleasure in accepting the amendment, so far as I am authorized to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the acting chairman of the committee, in reference to the last amendment he offered, if it is necessary for Congress to legislate in detail upon the amount of food furnished to enlisted men in the Navy?

Mr. SWANSON. I will say to the Senator that there is fixed specifically what shall be the food of an enlisted man in the Army and Navy. There is given a discretion that one kind of food can be substituted for another, but to prevent great extravagance, and with the high price of food in all parts of the world, there is a specific allowance of food for enlisted men. This enables the night watchmen to get it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then every detail down to the number of buttons upon the uniform I suppose is regulated by Congress.

Mr. SWANSON. We try to regulate it so that there will not be any extravagance.

Mr. LODGE. It is done by regulations of the Navy Department and those regulations are made a law by Congress.

Mr. KELLOGG. Congress is putting itself in the position of exercising executive power as well as legislative in all these matters apparently.

Mr. SWANSON. Very generous food is given the American Navy and the Army. The Government is very generous in that respect. There have been complaints sometimes that they were not given enough and others have complained that they were given too much. I think they have fixed a very generous food arrangement.

Mr. FLETCHER. I observe the Senator from Iowa limits the age to 35. We do not know how many Members of Congress that would include.

Mr. SWANSON. It is a temporary appointment.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not wish to offer an amendment, but I wish to direct the attention of the Senator from Virginia to lines 5 and 6, on page 2, and ask if that is intended to give the option to the man who enlists as to the time of his service, whether he shall serve for four years or a shorter period, or during the period of the war?

Mr. SWANSON. It was intended that he should have the option of four years or for the period of the war or for a shorter period as the President may prescribe.

Mr. WEEKS. Is it not possible that the men who are being taken into the service now are being taken into the service on account of the war, and if they enlist for a longer period than the war may last would we not have on our hands a much greater number of men than we would naturally need in the Naval Service after the war is over?

Mr. SWANSON. There might be, though the Senator will remember that one-fourth of the enlisted men go out every year, and we are anxious to have a reenlistment of the men whose terms expire.

Mr. WEEKS. I understood that the President had authorized the recruiting officers to enlist for the war, and that would be naturally the period for a man to serve. I do not care to offer an amendment, only I suggest the possibility that we might have 25,000 men serving for a year when we would not need their services.

Mr. SWANSON. It is considered now that the enlistments are for the period of the war, and consequently for four years or a shorter period, as the emergency may arise; but the committee thought it better to give an opportunity to enlist in this way, giving the choice. It is satisfied there will not be a very great surplus in time of peace.

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me that the point raised by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] is rather an important one. I should think if the language was for one year or for the period of the war the enlistments would be made for the period of the war, and then if the war terminated inside of one year they would have served their term of enlistment; but if the war terminated inside the period of four years these men would have to serve for four years under that provision. As I understand the construction of the language, the department can hold a man to have enlisted for the period of the war no matter whether his enlistment was for 6 months or 12 months or for the period of the war or whether it was for a longer time. Under this language he would have to serve four years.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Virginia that there seems to be something in the point the Senator from Florida is making. As the wording is now the President may prescribe a shorter period of enlistment than four years. I think it is intended to allow the President to prescribe the period. I think we ought to word it "for four years or for the period of the war or for such other shorter period or periods as the President may prescribe."

Mr. WEEKS. How could any harm come from the provision if the limitation were made for the duration of the war? That is the period for which we are enlisting these men.

Mr. LODGE. We have enlisted men for the usual term of four years up to 87,000. We are acting under the law as it exists, and those men have enlisted for four years. Now, above that as we are passing the bill it will go up to 150,000, and they are enlisting for the period of the war, and that is prescribed by the department. I think it ought to have the power to prescribe it. It seems to me this does not leave it to the President to prescribe the term. I agree with my colleague.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think, beyond any doubt, if the language remains as it is the men enlisted will have to serve for four years no matter whether the war ends in 6 months or 12 months.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think so.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the House has it a little different:

That enlistments in the Navy and Marine Corps, during such time as the United States may be at war, shall be for four years or for the period of the war or for such shorter period or periods as the President may prescribe.

Through a mistake the House changed it. It ought to read:

Shall be for four years, or for such shorter period or periods as the President may prescribe, or for the period of the war.

I offer an amendment to make it conform to the memorandum I have here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator kindly repeat the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Transpose the words "or for the period of the present war," and put in a comma after the word "prescribe," so that it will read:

SEC. 3. That enlistments in the Navy and Marine Corps, during such time as the United States may be at war, shall be for four years, or for such shorter period or periods as the President may prescribe, or for the period of the present war.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. On page 4, line 10, I move to strike out "50" and to insert "55."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 10, before the word "years," it is proposed to strike out "50" and insert "55," so as to read:

Provided, That in making appointments authorized herein the maximum age limit shall be 55 years for commissioned warrant officers—

And so forth.

Mr. SWANSON. I hope the Senator will not insist on that. The Navy Department recommended 40 and then went to 45, and we put it at 50. It seems to me if a man is a lieutenant commander, a junior lieutenant, or a major coming from the outside we ought not to have the limit above 50.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does not this age also cover that of enlisted men?

Mr. SWANSON. No.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What is the age limit for enlisted men? I read it hurriedly.

Mr. SWANSON. I think 35 years for active service in the Navy. This only covers officers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The bill now only covers officers?

Mr. SWANSON. It only covers temporary officers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. So the amendment we have put on simply provides for Members of Congress when they become officers?

Mr. SWANSON. No; it provides for them as individuals, as enlisted men, not officers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I heard the Senator say that the age limit was 50 years for enlisted men when some one suggested that it ought to go to 35

Mr. SWANSON. No; for temporary officers. We are allowed to appoint temporary officers to the enlisted strength, from 93,000 to 150,000. They can not appoint them beyond the age limit of 50 years.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What age will the amendment which was adopted cover?

Mr. SWANSON. I think the requirement for the Navy is 35 years.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In other words, it will only apply to Members of Congress under 35 years of age?

Mr. SWANSON. I think so.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is the age limit I want to increase.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator can offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa and fix any age limit he pleases.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to offer that amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. I hope the Senator will withdraw the one he first proposed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well; because it did not cover what I thought it did from the remark the Senator made a while ago. I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Iowa will be reconsidered. The Senator from Washington offers an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the maximum age limit under the foregoing provision shall be 60 years.

Mr. NORRIS. Will not the Senator provide that there shall be no age limit for Members of Congress? It is not a conscription; it is all voluntary.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I offer the amendment as I proposed it.

Mr. NORRIS. It is partiality to shut out men at 60 who might like to get in.

Mr. SWANSON. It is entirely voluntary. The Navy has no conscription.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] the following proviso:

Provided, That the maximum age limit under the foregoing provision shall be 60 years instead of that now provided by law.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hale	McKellar	Smith, Mich.
Broussard	Hardwick	McLean	Smith, S. C.
Calder	Hollis	Martin	Smoot
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Myers	Sterling
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	New	Sutherland
Curtis	Kellogg	Norris	Swanson
Fernald	Kendrick	Page	Thomas
Fletcher	Kenyon	Pittman	Townsend
France	Kirby	Poindexter	Trammell
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Shafroth	Underwood
Gallinger	Lewis	Sheppard	Vardaman
Gerry	Lodge	Smith, Ariz.	Warren
Gore	McCumber	Smith, Md.	Wolcott

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] are unavoidably absent on official business.

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] are detained on official business of the Senate.

Mr. WOLCOTT. My colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY] desired me to announce that he is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum of the Senate present.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota his construction of the next to the last paragraph of his amendment, which reads as follows——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from North Dakota has not yet been presented.

Mr. KELLOGG. I beg pardon.

Mr. McCUMBER. Nevertheless the Senator can ask the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment had better be reported.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before offering the amendment, I wish to call attention to the fact that we have now a Bureau of Construction and Repair in the Navy Department, the chief of which is Chief Constructor David W. Taylor, and the assistant is Naval Constructor Robert Stocker, United States Navy. In formulating this amendment I have taken care to include every member of this board, so that while it gives the board a designation it nevertheless is but an addition to the membership in a certain bureau during the war. I offer the following amendment as section 3½, between lines 6 and 7, on page 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 6, insert a new section in the bill, to be known as section 3½, as follows:

SEC. 3½. There is hereby created in the Department of the Navy a board which shall be known and designated as the "board of merchant shipping defenses." Said board shall consist of the Chief Constructor of the Bureau of Construction and Repair of the Navy Department, the naval constructor of such bureau, the Commissioner of Patents, and the following other persons, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to wit: One of the highest recognized skill and experience in the construction of merchant ships; one with the highest recognized skill and experience in the navigation of such vessels; and two with the highest recognized skill, experience, and knowledge of mechanical devices used in the great steel manufacturing plants of the country. The chief of construction shall be the chairman of said board

Each member of said board shall receive a salary of $5,000 per year and reasonable expenses while employed in the duties of said board: Provided, That officials receiving salaries from the Government shall not have their salaries diminished by reason of services on said board.

The duty of said board and the purpose of its creation is to provide for and perfect in the shortest possible time such mechanical device or devices as can be successfully used and employed upon a merchant ship while navigating the seas to check or deflect the course of a submarine torpedo and to prevent the same from coming in contact with the hull of the merchant vessel, or to explode the same before such contact, or the perfection of any other mechanical device to protect merchant vessels from destruction by submarine other than by use of defense guns.

The said board, immediately upon its organization, shall advertise for suggestions from mechanics, inventors and others, and shall examine into and pass upon the practicability or feasibility of any proposed mechanism. For the purpose of directing the inventive genius of the people of this country toward the protection of merchant shipping against the menace and enormous devastation of submarine torpedoes the sum of $1,000,000 is hereby appropriated as a reward to any person or persons who shall succeed in inventing or producing any mechanism that will accomplish the purpose aforesaid, said sum to be divided among those who have furnished material assistance in the perfecting of any such mechanism in accordance with the degree of services rendered by him or them and to be apportioned by said board.

The said board shall furnish all reasonable assistance and opportunities for testing such proposed means and appliances for accomplishing this end.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from North Dakota a question relating to the next to the last paragraph. It reads:

For the purpose of directing the inventive genius of the people of this country toward the protection of merchant shipping against the menace and enormous devastation of submarine torpedoes the sum of $1,000,000 is hereby appropriated as a reward to any person or persons who shall succeed in inventing or producing any mechanism that will accomplish the purpose aforesaid, said sum to be divided among those who have furnished material assistance in the perfecting of any such mechanism in accordance with the degree of services rendered by him or them and to be apportioned by said board.

Do I understand that the board has no discretion, but if a mechanism is discovered which accomplishes the purpose the $1,000,000 must be paid?

Mr. McCUMBER. If any person or number of persons, though they be 100, should succeed, either working together in their efforts or on suggestions from many different sources, should result in securing any mechanism that would protect our ships, then it would be divided according to the efforts or the service that had been rendered.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is not the question. The question is if one man, we will say, produces a discovery, or accomplishes the purposes aforesaid, he must be paid the million dollars, or can he be paid a hundred thousand or two hundred thousand dollars?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; he must be paid the million dollars.

Mr. KELLOGG. Do you in the amendment clearly give the board the power to decide whether the invention has accomplished the purpose?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. Whereabouts?

Mr. McCUMBER. The million dollars can only be awarded in case the invention has accomplished the purpose.

Mr. KELLOGG. I know; but who decides whether it has accomplished the purpose?

Mr. McCUMBER. The board.

Mr. KELLOGG. Where does it say the board shall have the decision?

Mr. McCUMBER. It says, "The board immediately upon its organization," and then proceeds—to be divided among those who have furnished material assistance in the perfecting of any such mechanism in accordance with the degree of services rendered by him or them and to be apportioned by said board.

If they did not perfect a mechanism that accomplishes the result, there would be nothing to be paid.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is quite true; but I want to find out whether the amendment clearly leaves it to the board to say whether any mechanism has been perfected that will accomplish the object or whether none has been perfected.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is my construction.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is what I wished to know.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In line 21 the amendment states that the board "shall examine into and pass upon the practicability or feasibility of any proposed mechanism." Does not that answer the question of the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. KELLOGG. That is rather doubtful.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think not, because by that it was intended simply that they should pass upon the question of the feasibility of a proposed mechanism. There would be so many devices proposed that they could tell in a moment by an examination that some would not be practicable. They would select those which were practicable or feasible and then give an opportunity to try out those which they deemed to be of sufficient merit to warrant their trial.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Is it contemplated by the clause to which the Senator from Minnesota has just referred that the board shall actually adopt the device before the award can be distributed?

Mr. McCUMBER. I suppose they will have to demonstrate it beyond any question, and then I assume naturally the Government would adopt it if they demonstrate that it is feasible.

Mr. KNOX. I think it is perfectly clear that they have the power to pass upon the practicability and feasibility of the proposed mechanism. Suppose they do, as a matter of fact, say that it is feasible and practicable but for some reason or other it is not adopted; say, the war should come to a conclusion before it could be put in operation, before the board could pass upon it, what is the Senator's idea, then, about the distribution of the award?

Mr. McCUMBER. The proposed board is to determine the merits of any device, and when they have determined that a device is practicable and will accomplish the result desired, then the person who has invented it should be entitled to his remuneration, whether the war continues or not.

Mr. KNOX. That is what I want to get at.

Mr. McCUMBER. Even if there should be no further war, the discovery would be worth billions to us.

Mr. KNOX. Then, I desire to ask another question of the Senator. There is a proviso in connection with the salary provision that officials receiving salaries from the Government shall not have their salaries diminished by reason of service on the board. Is it contemplated that their salaries may be increased?

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President, it is not; but it contemplates if any member on this board is receiving less than that salary now that his salary will be increased because of the performance of this added work.

Mr. KNOX. I think it is rather doubtful whether the amendment will bear that construction.

Mr. McCUMBER. If there were a possibility that it would not bear that construction, at least they will be getting the salary which they are now receiving; and I thought that that was sufficient.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. The amendment contemplates, as I understand, that the experiments shall be conducted at the Government expense?

Mr. McCUMBER. It does.

Mr. KIRBY. And that the board shall then be paid in addition to that expense. Is that what the amendment contemplates?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is correct.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. On page 3, line 4, if the Senator would add the words which I am going to suggest, I think the amendment would clearly give the board the power to pass upon the question whether the object has been accomplished. I suggest, on page 3, line 4, after the word "accomplish," to insert "in the judgment of said board."

Mr. McCUMBER. There is no question but that that would make it more certain, and I accept that modification of my amendment, although I think that it is certain the way the amendment now reads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish merely to say a word. More than a year ago I prophesied in an address upon the floor of the Senate the disasters which have overtaken the merchant marine of the world. I tried at that time to secure the attention of Congress and the attention of the administration to its duty, if possible, to meet the situation by directing its efforts toward protecting our ships against the submarine. Little or no attention was paid to the appeal at that time. Since that time, however, we have realized the full devastation wrought by the submarine. My prophecy at that time has been more than fulfilled. Had we then given the subject the proper consideration, I am quite certain that by this time we should have been able to meet the torpedo question. I think the fact that thousands of ships have gone down to the bottom of the sea, that thousands of lives have been lost, and that cargoes of enormous value have been sunk has been due to the negligence of the great world powers in not exerting their efforts along this particular line; and I want to prophesy again that unless we do something—unless we shall be able to accomplish something along this line—the devastation and destruction during the next six months will be so horrible that we shall only mention them with bated breath. I want to put myself on record by a yea-and-nay vote as voting at least for an attempt to accomplish the result of meeting the great emergency created by the torpedo.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from North Dakota an amendment which will make the matter of payment of the reward a little more clear. I would suggest that after the word "be," in line 4, on page 3, there be inserted the words "paid on approval of such mechanism by said board and to be," so that it will read:

Any mechanism that will accomplish the purpose aforesaid, said sum to be paid on approval of such mechanism by said board and to be divided—

And so forth.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will accept that suggestion, although I do not think it is necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to. The question now is upon the amendment as amended, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). In the absence of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a pair for the afternoon with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. Unless I can get a transfer I shall withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I inquire whether the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have a general pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY] on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. REED. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]; and

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

Mr. VARDAMAN. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS. I again wish to announce the necessary absence on official business of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING], the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], and the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON].

Mr. TOWNSEND. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 36, as follows:

So Mr. MCCUMBER's amendment as amended was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. SWANSON. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. SWANSON, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, and Mr. LODGE were appointed conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENLISTMENT OF ALIENS IN THE NAVAL RESERVE FORCE.

Mr. SWANSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2337) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to enrollments in the Naval Reserve Force.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2337) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to enrollments in the Naval Reserve Force.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved August 29, 1916, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding after the proviso under the heading "Naval Reserve Force," which reads as follows: "Provided, That citizens of the insular possessions of the United States may enroll in the Naval Auxiliary Reserve," a further proviso, as follows: Provided further, That such persons who are not citizens of the United States, but who have or shall have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, and who are citizens of countries which are at peace with the United States, may enroll in the Naval Reserve Force subject to the condition that they may be discharged from such enrollment at any time within the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, and such persons who may, under existing law, become citizens of the United States, and who render honorable service in the Naval Reserve Force in time of war for a period of not less than one year may become citizens of the United States without proof of residence on shore and without further requirement than proof of good moral character and certificate from the Secretary of the Navy that such honorable service was actually rendered.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 43, being Senate bill 2263.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2263) to provide further for the national security and defense, to conserve foods, feeds, and fuels, and to prevent monopolies, conspiracies, and other evil practices respecting the same, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

Mr. GORE. I now ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this is a very important bill. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he intends to go on with the bill to-night?

Mr. GORE. I desire to state that my purpose is to yield for a few minutes to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate bill 1811, which is entitled "A bill providing for the counting of service in the Army and Navy of the United States as equivalent to residence and cultivation upon homestead entries, and in the event of the soldier's death in such service providing for the issuance of patent for such land to his widow or minor children."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the bill now under consideration should be first temporarily laid aside.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent to temporarily lay aside that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

RELIEF OF HOMESTEADERS.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I now renew my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1811) providing for the counting of service in the Army or Navy of the United States as equivalent to residence and cultivation upon homestead entries, and in the event of the soldier's death in such service providing for the issuance of patent for such land to his widow or minor children. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in every case in which a settler on the public land of the United States under the homestead laws enlists or is actually engaged in the military or naval service of the United States as private soldier, officer, seaman, marine, National Guardsman, or member of any other organization for offense or defense authorized by Congress during the existing war with Germany, or during any other war in which the United States may be engaged, his services therein shall, in the administration of the homestead laws, be construed to be equivalent to all intents and purposes to residence and cultivation for the same length of time upon the tract entered or settled upon; and hereafter no contest shall be initiated on the ground of abandonment, nor allegation of abandonment sustained against any such settler, unless it shall be alleged in the preliminary affidavit or affidavits of contest and proved at the hearing in cases hereafter initiated that the settler's alleged absence from the land was not due to his employment in such service; that if such settler shall be discharged on account of wounds received or disability incurred in the line of duty, then the term of his enlistment shall be deducted from the required length of residence without reference to the time of actual service.

SEC. 2. That in every case in which a settler on the public lands of the United States, under the homestead laws, dies while actually engaged in the military or naval service of the United States as private soldier, officer, seaman, marine, National Guardsman, or member of any other organization for offense or defense authorized by Congress during the existing war with Germany, or during any other war in which the United States may be engaged, his widow, if unmarried, or in case of her death or marriage, then his minor orphan children, or his or their legal representatives, may proceed forthwith to make final proof upon the land so entered and held by the deceased soldier and settler, and shall be entitled to receive Government patent for such land; and that the death of such soldier while so engaged in the service of the United States shall, in the administration of the homestead laws, be construed to be equivalent to a performance of all requirements as to residence and cultivation upon such homestead.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2263) to provide further for the national security and defense, to conserve foods, feeds, and fuels, and to prevent monopolies, conspiracies, and other evil practices respecting the same, and for other purposes.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in this bill there are one or two clerical errors which I desire first to have corrected.

On page 3, line 1, the word "agreement" should be "arrangement." I ask unanimous consent that that change be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 1, it is proposed to strike out the word "agreement" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "arrangement."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. At the end of line 1, page 3, the word "any" should be "an."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the line, it is proposed to strike out the word "any" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "an."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. There are two or three committee amendments that I wish to have considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for the consideration of committee amendments. The bill has not been read as yet.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, do I understand from the Chair that only the amendments will now be read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the bill will be read first for committee amendments.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, in section 3, page 2, line 23, after the word "person," to strike out the words "to commit or permit preventable waste or deterioration of any necessaries," and the comma, so as to read:

SEC. 3. That it is hereby made unlawful for any person to hoard, or to hold, or enter into any contract or arrangement for any necessaries in excess of an amount reasonably needed to supply his individual or business requirements for a reasonable time.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 18, page 5.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, we have reached an amendment there. I think this bill is too important to be considered at this hour with a thin Senate, and I think we ought to have a quorum, at all events. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. GORE. I wish to say to the Senator that I hope he will allow the bill to be read.

Mr. LODGE. I think this is too important a bill to be put through and the committee amendments disposed of at this hour.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts if there are not more Senators here now than there have been at any time to-day?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of no quorum has been made. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Jones, Wash.	New	Sterling
Broussard	Kellogg	Norris	Sutherland
Calder	Kendrick	Page	Thompson
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Pittman	Trammell
Fernald	Knox	Poindexter	Wadsworth
France	Lodge	Shafroth	Warren
Gallinger	McKellar	Sheppard	Weeks
Gore	McLean	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Gronna	Martin	Smith, Mich.
Harding	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Johnson, Cal.	Nelson	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-one Senators have answered to their names—not a quorum. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. KIRBY, Mr. POMERENE, and Mr. SIMMONS answered to their names when called.

Mr. STONE, Mr. JONES of New Mexico, Mr. PENROSE, Mr. THOMAS, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. LEWIS, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. FALL entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of Senators BECKHAM, ROBINSON, and HUSTING, who are detained from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is upon the amendment submitted by the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 18, after the word "standard," it is proposed to insert a colon and the following words: "Provided, That such requirements and regulations shall not apply to highly perishable fruits and vegetables," so as to read:

Whenever any standard for a receptacle becomes effective under this section no person thereafter shall pack for sale, offer for sale, consign for sale, or sell, in a receptacle, any commodity to which such standard for a receptacle is applicable, unless the receptacle conform to the standard, subject to reasonable variations therefrom permitted in the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, or unless the receptacle be so different in form, shape, and capacity as upon ordinary observation clearly to be distinguishable from the standard: Provided, That such requirements and regulations shall not apply to highly perishable fruits and vegetables.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I assume that the pending bill will evoke more or less discussion, but I have no disposition to request its further consideration this afternoon if Senators are not prepared to go forward with it. I wish to say, however, that yielding only to more urgent legislation, if such there be, I shall insist upon the consideration of this measure until it is finally disposed of by the Senate.

I ask unanimous consent to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, about two weeks ago the daily press of my home city of Denver gave prominent space to a letter of Mr. Ralph W. Smith, chairman of the local branch of one of the national war leagues, which severely criticized my attitude concerning the pending Army bill. When apprised of this, I prepared a reply to Mr. Smith's aspersions, copies of which I mailed to the managers or proprietors of these papers, requesting their publication, that my constituents, in justice to myself, be apprised of my side of the question.

With the single exception of the Evening Express, a Scripps paper, these journals have ignored my request completely. They have neither published my letter, made any reference to it, nor apprised me of its receipt, a course the injustice of which is too obviously manifest to require comment.

Because of this treatment, I am driven to the necessity of reaching my constituency upon this subject through the columns of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I shall therefore beg the indulgence of Senators and trespass upon their time long enough to read my letter to the public.

MAY 5, 1917.

RALPH W. SMITH, Esq.,
Chairman, etc., Denver, Colo.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of what the Morning News calls your "scathing reply" to my letter to you of April 23, in which you inform the public and myself, among other things, that you were instructed by your committee to say that the tenor of my letter was not unexpected. Had you announced that you had been instructed to sign a letter carefully prepared for that purpose you might have escaped some of the responsibility for its recitals.

In giving the public the benefit of our correspondence, why did you omit the telegram which begun it? Was it because you were "instructed" to omit it or did you possess the wit to perceive that its omission was essential to the stale charge of sophistry to which little minds always resort when trying their hands at public discussion?

On April 20 your committee wired me to "give unhesitating and ungrudging support to every measure demanded by the President; also to vote on every occasion in favor of the President's policy relative to the prosecution of the war." Not one measure, but every measure; not one occasion, but every occasion. This language is perfectly plain and comprehends a series of measures beginning with the war declaration of April 5 and ending the Lord only knows where. Collectively they constitute the President's policy.

At the time of its receipt the Senate was considering one of these measures, popularly called the espionage bill. The conscription bill, another of them, had not then been taken from the calendar. Naturally, in my answer, I directed your attention to the pending measure which your telegram covered as fully as the others, telling you why I could not support it as it stood and also informing you that I should give my reasons publicly for every vote I might have "to cast against pending measures"; so that my constituency would know what they were, whether they approved or not, and that I would exercise my powers of independent judgment in determining what to do. I assumed that you knew the tenor of your own telegram and would, therefore, understand the relevancy of my reply; but upon reading your letter, I perceive that I very greatly overrated your intelligence. Perhaps I should have known better.

I am accused of resorting to unworthy tactics to excuse my failure to support the President in a matter of military policy because I refer "to a bill on a wholly different subject"; that it is not "the measure which it (the committee) urged me to support"; and that "the committee can not be diverted from the issue by such sophistry." The effort at diversion with which you charge me finds its sole support upon a perversion of your own. To convict me of the serious offense of sophistry you falsify your own telegram by confining it to a single measure. Be it so, sophism is immeasurably preferable to the low cunning which fabricates a record to support a charge. Your committee is composed for the most part of sensible and experienced business men, who, I am sure, would stoop to no such conduct. Why they should select you for their chairman is comprehensible only upon the theory that you organized it by a petition in which you named yourself for the place. I have heard of men who, in a spirit of thoughtless accommodation, signed a petition asking for their own execution; perhaps some of them still survive and live in Denver.

Having "diverted" yourself from your telegram by altering its language and confining its scope to "a matter of military policy," you misconstrue my letter to suit your purpose and then become "inexpressibly amazed by my charge that the President is ignorant of vitally important features of the measure which you urged me to support, and I insinuate that the President is but little better informed than the committee." In this you take that liberty with my letter which you have exercised with your own telegram. I protest against it. You may mutilate your own record to your heart's content. Mine must remain inviolate.

I have not said that the President was ignorant of the vital features of any measure. With them, he is, of course, familiar. Even you probably know that the "vital features" of the recent draft bill is conscription. I said, and I repeat, that the President was probably as unfamiliar with its details as you were. It is impossible that it should be otherwise. Upon this subject Senator SMITH of Georgia, an ex-member of the Cabinet, speaking on the espionage bill, said yesterday:

"But it has been suggested that the President has approved this proposed legislation. Why, he has not, Mr. President. I have heard his letter read; and pardon me for saying that I have some knowledge of how officers of departments bring bills to the President and how he sends them to committees of Congress. It is utterly impossible for a President to study in detail and master every bill that the head of one of his departments may desire to present to Congress. Take the length of time it has required for the Judiciary Committee to study this bill. Why, the President probably read it in half an hour if he read it at all. Pardon me for saying that when I was Secretary of the Interior I submitted bills to the President of the United States and obtained letters from him, transmitting them with his commendation to the chairman of a committee of Congress, that he knew practically nothing about, and I would write the letter for him. So for Congress to accept the view that the President has mastered in detail a bill of this kind because he sends it to Congress for the consideration of a committee is utterly to misconceive the truth. It is impossible for any human being occupying the office of President, if he combined all the wisdom that has been possessed since the days of Solomon, to master in detail the various pieces of legislation presented to him."

This, I presume, you will construe as a grave reflection upon the President. How tenderly his new-found friends regard him!

A "measure" soon to be considered and "demanded by the President" proposes to raise $1,800,000,000 of additional revenue. Many taxpayers, including some members of the National Defense League, are voicing protests against it louder than the guns of the allies in France. They are anxious to draft our young men for the trenches, but they want their dollars to stay at home. This bill lays a heavy hand on life and accident insurance companies, which, I think, at this crisis should be exempt. Do you agree with me? Or shall I "ungrudgingly and unhesitatingly" accept the bill as it comes from the Treasury Department?

The espionage bill, as drawn, would completely muzzle the press and imprison you, if you thought aloud and your thoughts offended some understrapper of the War Department. Shall I swallow it whole, because the President demands it, through his Attorney General, or compel the excision of its despotic features, which I know the President will applaud?

You remind me of my former support of the President in matters "vitally affecting" the State to its disadvantage, etc. With this expression, you are evidently enamored, else you would not constantly repeat it, like Polly asking for a cracker. I voted to remove the duty on sugar, to which you refer, and long for an opportunity to again do so. My people approved my action then, as they are doing now, for they know that I stood then as now by my convictions and not yours.

I have no doubt your committee's "regret that I have placed myself on the same level with the two discredited Members of the House of Representatives" is measureless. But before they go into mourning, let me assure them, through you, that I must descend to an intellectual level infinitely below that to which they have consigned me before I reach the plane occupied by men who presume to order me to blindly support public measures of whose details they admit their ignorance. And I shall enjoy the confidence of the President, which I now possess, when the frantic zeal of his new converts shall have been extinguished in the chorus of their angry disapproval. Then, as now, I shall probably be instructed by "a committee of which you are chairman" to substitute their judgments for mine. Then, as now, I shall do so, provided they are consistent with my own, and not otherwise.

Yours, very truly,

C. S. THOMAS.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from the Penn Grain & Feed Co., of Philadelphia, Pa.; the Milwaukee Grain & Feed Co., of Milwaukee, Wis.; the Walker-Gordon Laboratory Co., of Plainsboro, N. J.; and the Farmers' Feed Co. of New York, of New York City, N. Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have received petitions signed by 30,000 people of Kansas, asking for legislation prohibiting the use of food products in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors during the period of the war, which I present for proper reference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petitions will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GRONNA presented a petition of the Commercial Club of Devils Lake, N. Dak., praying for the passage of the so-called universal compulsory military training bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Hannaford, N. Dak., and a petition of the committee on Federal affairs of the High School of Steele, N. Dak., praying for the supervision and control of all food products and for prohibition during the period of the war, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KNOX presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition during the period of the war, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a petition of sundry citizens of Runge, Tex., praying for national prohibition during the period of the war, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SMOOT. I have received certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Utah, petitioning Congress upon certain subject matters. I desire to present them and ask to have them printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The joint resolutions are as follows:

Senate joint resolution 9. Urging that steps be taken by Congress and the several States to call a national meeting to consider the establishment of a definite line of division between Federal and State taxes.

Whereas in the exercise of its taxing power the Federal Government is embracing the sources of revenue heretofore not availed of by that Government; and

Whereas there exists a line which separates the taxable units that equitably and logically may be left solely to State taxation from the units logically belonging to the broader Federal jurisdiction; and

Whereas the establishment of some reasonable line of division giving to the States sole taxing authority below such line and to the Federal Government sole taxing authority above such line would cure much of the trouble existing because of conflict of jurisdiction between States, would relieve the tension between Federal and State Governments, would result in great economy in the levying and collection of taxes, and would relieve the growing dissatisfaction on the part of the taxpayer resulting from irritating and expensive duplication of accounts and reports and double taxation: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Utah, jointly, That we respectfully urge upon the Congress of the United States and the legislatures of the several States the need of holding a congress of the States to consider the subject of Federal and State sources of revenue, with the object of adopting and urging upon the Congress of the United States a definite policy in the segregation of State and Federal revenue; and we urge the legislatures of the other States to provide for attendance of representatives at such congress; and be it further

Resolved, That the President of the United States be invited to appoint a representative and that both Houses of the Congress of the United States be invited to appoint representatives to attend such conference; and be it further

Resolved, That the governor of the State of Utah is hereby requested to urge the governors of other States to recommend favorable action and to arrange for the time and place of such national meeting; and that the governor of Utah be authorized to appoint delegates to represent the State of Utah at such conference; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forthwith transmitted by the secretary of the senate to the President of the Senate of the United States and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, a copy hereof to each Member of Congress from the State of Utah, and a copy to the president of the senate and to the speaker of the house of representatives of each State legislature in session at this time.

Approved March 8, 1917.

STATE OF UTAH,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, Harden Bennion, secretary of state of the State of Utah, do hereby certify that the foregoing resolution is a full, true, and complete copy of the original thereof as appears of record in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Utah this 30th day of April, A. D. 1917.

Senate joint memorial 2. Memorializing Congress to enact liberal and adequate legislation for development of water-power sites in the public-land States.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the governor and Legislature of the State of Utah, respectfully represent that—

Whereas agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing development is greatly retarded in the public-land States by reason of the fact that the numerous water-power sites on the public domain of the United States within the public-land States, and particularly within the State of Utah, are now incapable of development for want of adequate legislation; and

Whereas heretofore the Representatives of this State have petitioned Congress for a national policy with relation to the public domain that would render the natural resources of the State available for public use and benefit. It is for the best interest of this State and its citizens that these resources be developed and so vested as to render them subject to taxation and thus distribute over a wider area the burden of taxation for local government that is now being borne by less than 25 per cent of the total area of the State. It is particularly important that the vast quantities of water which are now being wasted may be utilized.

If legislation shall be enacted by the Congress of the United States which will encourage the investment of private capital in the development of these power sites, it will stimulate the mining and other industries dependent upon utilization of power for their operation; will render possible the irrigation by pumping of vast areas of arid lands which can not be reached by gravity systems; will encourage manufacturing by reason of the cheap power for such purposes thereby rendered available; will permit of the electrification of railroads, thereby preserving for the use of present and future generations the coal deposits of this and other States for other uses for which electric power is not available, and will otherwise greatly benefit this State and its residents.

The State possesses, through its police powers, ample means to prevent and correct the abuses of monopoly, and to enforce adequate service at fair and reasonable rates, and to secure for its citizens the ultimate benefits resulting from water-power development;

Therefore the governor and the Legislature of the State of Utah respectfully and earnestly petition the Congress of the United States to enact, at the present session, appropriate legislation prescribing a definite, broad, and liberal policy, and a simple and direct method, by which water-power sites on the public domain in Federal ownership and control may be economically developed with careful restrictions to safeguard against the appropriation of power sites and power rights for speculative purposes, and not in good faith for immediate development and use.

The secretary of state of the State of Utah is hereby directed to transmit a copy of this joint memorial to the President, to each House of Congress, and to each Senator and Representative in Congress from this State.

Approved February 9, 1917.

STATE OF UTAH,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, Harden Bennion, secretary of state of the State of Utah, do hereby certify that the foregoing memorial is a full, true, and complete copy of the original thereof, which was filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Utah on the 9th day of February, 1917.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Utah this 30th day of April, A. D. 1917.

Senate joint memorial 3. A memorial asking the Congress of the United States to authorize the franking of all printed matter of an educational nature issued by the State board of health.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Utah in legislature assembled, being the twelfth regular session, most respectfully petition as follows: That—

Whereas the importance of prompt and accurate record of births, deaths, and communicable diseases is now recognized by all civilized countries as of direct benefit to the Nation; and

Whereas the reporting of these births, deaths, and communicable diseases is now required by Federal and State laws, and it being for the general welfare of the public, your memoralists believe that this expense, in so far as postage is involved, should be borne by the public; and

Whereas the education of the people by means of printed matter pertaining to the preservation of health is conducive to the general public welfare: Therefore

We petition the Congress of the United States to authorize the franking of all reports of births, deaths, and communicable diseases to the proper officer, and all printed matter of an educational character issued by the State board of health to the people of the State in which such matter is issued.

Passed February 6, 1917.

I, Harden Bennion, secretary of state of the State of Utah, do hereby certify that the foregoing memorial is a full, true, and complete copy of the original thereof, which was filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Utah on the 20th day of February, 1917.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set hy hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Utah this 30th day of April, A. D. 1917.

Senate joint memorial 4. A memorial relating to Indian lands formerly within the Uintah Reservation.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the governor and Legislature of Utah, respectfully represent that—

Whereas upon the opening of the Uintah Reservation, situate in the State of Utah, more than 250,000 acres of land were reserved and set apart to be used as grazing lands by the Indians located within said Uintah Reservation; and

Whereas by the terms of the act opening said reservation to settlement, said Indians had been generously provided with lands for home, agricultural, and other purposes, and by reason of such provisions, required but a small part, if any, of said 250,000 acres reserved as aforesaid, for grazing or for any purpose; and

Whereas there are about 1,000 Indians residing within the limits of what was formerly the Uintah Reservation, and their numbers are constantly diminishing, and they make but little use of said 250,000 acres, and said use is a diminishing one, and in time will cease entirely; and

Whereas at least 30,000 acres of said 250,000 acres so set apart as, and claimed to be grazing lands only, are agricultural lands of a high order and can be made to produce agricultural crops such as are common to the district in which they are situate, and there is an abundance of water for their irrigation; and

Whereas there is a demand for lands for home purposes by many citizens of the United States who are desirous of obtaining homes and farms under the homestead laws of the United States; and

Whereas said lands so reserved are contiguous to and adjoin lands upon which thousands of settlers are located, and it is practically impossible for them to utilize their lands without conflicts arising with the Indians claiming said 250,000 acres; and

Whereas it will be for the best interest of the Indians as well as the Government of the United States, and its inhabitants, that the existing situation be changed, and that the agricultural lands aforesaid be thrown open to entry under the land laws of the United States, by those desiring to obtain homes and agricultural lands for home purposes; and that such portion of the residue of said tract not actually required by the Indians for grazing purposes be restored to the public domain or placed within the limits of forest reserves adjoining said tract: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the governor and Legislature of the State of Utah, respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States to enact the necessary legislation which will result in opening for entry to citizens of the United States the 30,000 acres of agricultural lands hereinbefore mentioned, and in restoring to the public domain, or placing within one or more forest reserves, the residue of said 250,000 acres of land which are not necessary for the use of said Indians for grazing purposes.

Senate joint memorial 5. Petition for reimbursement to the State of Utah from the Federal Government of $50,000 appropriated and paid by the State of Utah, under act of March, 1913, to Indian war veterans.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the governor and Legislature of the State of Utah, respectfully represent—

Whereas, under an act of the legislature approved March, 1913, the State of Utah appropriated and paid to the Indian war veterans of this State $50,000; and

Whereas said Indian war veterans were defenders of this Government in a period of great hardship and necessity, mostly during the time elapsing between 1847 and 1857, and thereby an inestimable and permanent good was rendered to our common Government by brave and patriotic defenders at the risk of their lives and, in many instances, with the loss of precious blood; and

Whereas the whole redounded to the benefit of our common country, in that it assisted and enabled exposed portions of our frontiers to be settled and organized: Now, therefore,

Your memorialists respectfully pray that our National Congress will, by suitable enactment, reimburse the State of Utah for the said amount of $50,000 which it has paid for the purposes aforesaid redounding to the common good and benefit of our National Government.

House joint memorial 1. A memorial to the Congress of the United States that Congress submit to the States a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the sale, manufacture, transportation, importation, and exportation of intoxicating liquors.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States whereby the sale, manufacture, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, and the exportation thereof from, the United States and all territories subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes are prohibited; and

Whereas your memorialists favor and desire an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as proposed by said resolution, believing that the happiness, prosperity, and well-being of the people of the United States will be greatly promoted thereby; and

Whereas your memorialists are informed that said resolution has been reported upon favorably by the Judiciary Committees of both Houses of Congress;

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Utah, That we respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States that Congress adopt said resolution and that said proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States be submitted to the legislatures of the States at the earliest possible date for their consideration.

Resolved further, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, directed to prepare and transmit forthwith certified copies of this memorial to the President of the United States, to the Presiding Officers of both branches of Congress, and to each of the Senators and Representatives from Utah.

House joint memorial 3. A memorial to the Congress of the United States that Congress survey and construct an interstate highway or road connecting the Mesa Verde National Park, the Natural Bridges Monument, the Grand Canyon National Monument, and the Mukuntuweap National Monument, and that Congress appropriate the necessary money for such road at an early date.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas the President of the United States, in the exercise of his authority under the act of Congress approved June 8, 1906, entitled "An act for the preservation of American antiquities," has created the Natural Bridges National Monument, the Rainbow Bridge National Monument, the Mukuntuweap National Monument, and the Grand Canyon National Monument, to include the great natural bridges of Utah, the wonderful Rainbow Arch, the Cliff Dwellers' Ruins, the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, and other wonders; and

Whereas Congress has created the Mesa Verde National Park containing certain other remarkable ruins of the cliff dwellers; and

Whereas the country between these great marvels of nature and ruins of antiquity contains many other scenic wonders which have not yet been reserved, and the country is almost entirely undeveloped Government land without railroad or other proper roads which would afford opportunities for the convenient travel of a large mass of people of the United States who would wish to visit them if they could be reached by automobiles; and

Whereas it would be a great benefit to the people of the United States to visit and study these wonders which would be accessible from a road connecting the Mesa Verde National Park, and the Natural Bridges with the Grand Canyon National Monument and the Mukuntuweap National Monument, and there are now trails for the entire distance between them which can be readily converted into an automobile highway; and

Whereas the present Congress has appropriated the sum of $15,000 for the building of a road through the Mukuntuweap National Monument which will attract thousands of people to that monument the coming summer and each succeeding year; and

Whereas a large proportion of these people who visit the accessible monument would proceed to the others and the famous natural bridges of Utah if opportunities were afforded for doing so: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Utah in legislature assembled, That the Congress of the United States be respectfully and earnestly petitioned to survey and construct a road which will connect the Mesa Verde National Park, the Natural Bridges, the Grand Canyon National Monument, and the Mukuntuweap National Monument, and that the necessary sum be appropriated by the Congress of the United States for this purpose at an early date.

Resolved further, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are earnestly requested to use their best efforts toward the securing of the enactment of such a law.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby directed to prepare and transmit forthwith certified copies of this memorial to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress, and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Utah.

House joint memorial 6. A memorial to the Congress of the United States, petitioning the Government to pass the Federal suffrage amendment.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the governor and Legislature of the State of Utah, respectfully represent that—

Whereas the Federal amendment to grant the right of suffrage to women equally with men has been before the Congress of the United States for the past 40 years; and

Whereas the women of the nonsuffrage States feel that the time is come when the Congress should give favorable consideration to this measure of justice to one-half the citizens of these United States: Now, therefore,

The governor and the Legislature of the State of Utah respectfully petition that the said suffrage amendment receive favorable consideration before the sixty-fourth session of Congress adjourns.

House joint memorial 8. A memorial to the Congress of the United States of America, petitioning the United States Government to assist in the maintenance of public schools of the State of Utah attended by children of lessees of land in the former Uintah Indian Reservation.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Your memorialists, the governor and the Legislature of the State of Utah, respectfully represent that—

Whereas the school districts of Duchesne and Uintah Counties, in the State of Utah, having a school population of 3,000, 300 of whom are children of lessees of Indian lands in the former Uintah Indian Reservation, have insufficient funds to provide proper educational facilities for the children in such districts owing to the fact that such territory is very sparsely settled; that there are no railroads or other public utilities to produce revenue; and the further fact that such school districts derive no revenue from leaseholders in the former Uintah Indian Reservation; and

Whereas an extensive advertising campaign is now being made for lessees for 100,000 acres more of said Indian lands, which will increase the school population very materially, without increasing the revenue; and

Whereas the settlers of such school districts feel that the education of the children of such leaseholders is a distinct and unfair burden placed upon them; and

Whereas the cost of maintaining the schools in such districts during the required school year amounts to approximately $30 per capita, exclusive of buildings: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the governor and the Legislature of the State of Utah do most respectfully urge and request that Congress appropriate an amount sufficient to cover the cost of educating the children of lessees of land in the said former Uintah Indian Reservation; and

Resolved further, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, instructed to forward copies of this memorial to the President, the Senate and House of Representatives, and to Utah's congressional delegation, with the request that they use every legitimate effort to promote the objects of said memorial.

House joint memorial 9. A memorial petitioning Congress to rescind the order withdrawing from entry certain lands situate in Uintah County for reservoir purposes.

To the President and to the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

Whereas the executive department of the Federal Government by recent proclamation withdrew from entry approximately 250,000 acres of land situated within Uintah County, Utah, for the claimed purpose of building a reservoir in order to impound the waters of Green River for use in California; and

Whereas the feasibility of such a project has not been demonstrated; and

Whereas the building of a reservoir within the area withdrawn as aforesaid would destroy several thousand acres of land now occupied, much of which is improved, and would also destroy the town of Randlett and the trading post known as Ouray, and would also deprive many citizens of lands which have been entered by them under the various laws of the United States, and would also result in covering many thousand acres of land now owned by the Government, but which are fertile and susceptible of cultivation and which would furnish homes and farms to a large number of people, and would likewise prevent the construction of contemplated railroads (surveys which have been made), and which are indispensable to the development of the eastern and northeastern part of Utah and portions of Wyoming and Colorado; and

Whereas within said area withdrawn as aforesaid there are large and valuable deposits of gilsonite, elaterite, asphaltum, and other hydrocarbons and also rich and undeveloped oil fields; and

Whereas the value of said land so withdrawn as aforesaid for agricultural and grazing purposes and because of the limitless and inexhaustible deposits of hydrocarbons, including the various kinds of oil common to the oil fields of California and Wyoming, can not be definitely determined, but unquestionably would amount to many millions of dollars; and

Whereas, as stated, the construction of a reservoir upon said withdrawn lands would result in the destruction of homes and valuable property as well as the destruction of lands capable of sustaining thousands of people and yielding millions of dollars in valuable mining and hydrocarbon products, without any adequate or commensurate benefit to the State of California; and

Whereas the execution of the project aforesaid would be greatly injurious, not only to the people of Utah, but to the people of other States, as well as to the Government of the United States; and

Whereas, if it is desirable that reservoirs should be constructed for the purpose of impounding the waters of the Colorado River or any of its tributaries, other sites can be procured where the building of one or more reservoirs would not prove so injurious and work such damage and injury to residents and citizens of Utah and other States and to the Government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of Utah does hereby respectfully protest against the withdrawal of said lands for the purpose aforesaid or for any purpose; and be it

Resolved, That the executive department of the Government be requested to rescind and set aside said order withdrawing said lands for reservoir purposes, to the end that said lands may be restored to the status in which they were found prior to the promulgation of said Executive order of withdrawal. And your petitioners will ever pray.

Approved, March 12, 1917.

House joint memorial 11. A memorial petitioning Congress to make an appropriation for the transcontinental railway semicentennial celebration.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Utah, hereby present for your consideration the following memorial:

Whereas the first transcontinental railway was completed in 1869, when a golden spike was driven at the completion of the work near Ogden, Utah; and

Whereas the accomplishment of this gigantic undertaking was the most potent factor in the development of an empire of wealth, population, and possibilities; and

Whereas the results of the establishment of this transcontinental railway were of lasting and measureless benefit to this Republic in providing homes for a growing population, opportunities for loyal citizens who stand ready to serve their country in any capacity at any time or call; and

Whereas it has been decided by the Legislature of Utah, in its twelfth session, to provide $500,000 for the purpose of holding a golden spike exposition at Ogden, Utah, in the year 1919, commemorating the semicentennial anniversary of the completion of the first transcontinental railway: Therefore

The twelfth session of the Legislature of the State of Utah respectfully requests that the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America enact such legislation and make such an appropriation for this purpose as may properly indicate the interest and appreciation of the American people for this wonderful achievement.

Also, that a copy of this memorial be furnished Senator SMOOT, Senator KING, and Congressman MAYS and WELLING, for presentation to the Senate and House of Representatives.

Approved, March 8, 1917.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

Of course the report can not be acted upon by the Senate until after the House has taken action, but in order that it may be printed in the RECORD in advance for the information of the Senate I desire to present it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the conference report will be received and printed in the RECORD.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That in view of the existing emergency, which demands the raising of troops in addition to those now available, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized—

"First. Immediately to raise, organize, officer, and equip all or such number of increments of the Regular Army provided by the national defense act approved June 3, 1916, or such parts thereof as he may deem necessary; to raise all organizations of the Regular Army, including those added by such increments, to the maximum enlisted strength authorized by law. Vacancies in the Regular Army created or caused by the addition of increments as herein authorized which can not be filled by promotion may be filled by temporary appointment for the period of the emergency or until replaced by permanent appointments or by provisional appointments made under the provisions of section 23 of the national defense act, approved June 3, 1916, and hereafter provisional appointments under said section may be terminated whenever it is determined, in the manner prescribed by the President, that the officer has not the suitability and fitness requisite for permanent appointment.

"Second. To draft into the military service of the United States, organize, and officer, in accordance with the provisions of section 111 of said national defense act, so far as the provisions of said section may be applicable and not inconsistent with the terms of this act, any or all members of the National Guard and of the National Guard Reserves, and said members so drafted into the military service of the United States shall serve therein for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged: Provided, That when so drafted the organizations or units of the National Guard shall, so far as practicable, retain the State designations of their respective organizations.

"Third. To raise by draft as herein provided, organize and equip an additional force of 500,000 enlisted men, or such part or parts thereof as he may at any time deem necessary, and to provide the necessary officers, line and staff, for said force and for organizations of the other forces hereby authorized, or by combining organizations of said other forces, by ordering members of the Officers' Reserve Corps to temporary duty in accordance with the provisions of section 38 of the national-defense act approved June 3, 1916; by appointment from the Regular Army, the Officers' Reserve Corps, from those duly qualified and registered pursuant to section 23 of the act of Congress approved January 21, 1903 (32 Stat. L., p. 775), from the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, from those who have been graduated from educational institutions at which military instruction is compulsory, or from those who have had honorable service in the Regular Army, the National Guard, or in the Volunteer forces, or from the country at large; by assigning retired officers of the Regular Army to active duty with such force with their rank on the retired list and the full pay and allowances of their grade; or by the appointment of retired officers and enlisted men, active or retired, of the Regular Army as commissioned officers in such forces: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organizations of the Regular Army: Provided further, That the President is authorized to increase or decrease the number of organizations prescribed for the typical brigades, divisions, or army corps of the Regular Army, and to prescribe such new and different organizations and personnel for army corps, divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions, squadrons, companies, troops, and batteries as the efficiency of the service may require: Provided further, That the number of organizations in a regiment shall not be increased nor shall the number of regiments be decreased: Provided further, That the President in his discretion may organize, officer, and equip for each Infantry and Cavalry brigade three machine-gun companies, and for each Infantry and Cavalry division four machine-gun companies, all in addition to the machine-gun companies comprised in organizations included in such brigades and divisions: Provided further, That the President in his discretion may organize for each division one armored motor car machine-gun company. The machine-gun companies organized under this section shall consist of such commissioned and enlisted personnel and be equipped in such manner as the President may prescribe: And provided further, That officers with rank not above that of colonel shall be appointed by the President alone, and officers above that grade by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided further, That the President may in his discretion, recommission in the Coast Guard persons who have heretofore held commissions in the Revenue-Cutter Service or the Coast Guard and have left the service honorably, after ascertaining that they are qualified for service physically, morally, and as to age and military fitness.

"Fourth. The President is further authorized, in his discretion and at such time as he may determine, to raise and begin the training of an additional force of 500,000 men organized, officered, and equipped, as provided for the force first mentioned in the preceding paragraph of this section.

"Fifth. To raise by draft, organize, equip, and officer, as provided in the third paragraph of this section, in addition to and for each of the above forces, such recruit training units as he may deem necessary for the maintenance of such forces at the maximum strength.

"Sixth. To raise, organize, officer, and maintain during the emergency such number of ammunition batteries and battalions, depot batteries and battalions, and such artillery parks, with such numbers and grades of personnel as he may deem necessary. Such organizations shall be officered in the manner provided in the third paragraph of this section, and enlisted men may be assigned to said organizations from any of the forces herein provided for or raised by selective draft as by this act provided.

"Seventh. The President is further authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment, to organize, and equip, not to exceed four Infantry divisions, the officers of which shall be selected in the manner provided by paragraph 3 of section 1 of this act: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organization of the Regular Army: And provided further, That there shall be no enlistments in said force of men under 25 years of age at time of enlisting: And provided further, That no such volunteer force shall be accepted in any unit smaller than a division.

"SEC. 2. That the enlisted men required to raise and maintain the organizations of the Regular Army and to complete and maintain the organizations embodying the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, at the maximum legal strength as by this act provided, shall be raised by voluntary enlistment, or if and whenever the President decides that they can not effectually be so raised or maintained, then by selective draft; and all other forces hereby authorized, except as provided in the seventh paragraph of section 1, shall be raised and maintained by selective draft exclusively; but this provision shall not prevent the transfer to any force of training cadres from other forces. Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, both inclusive, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act. Quotas for the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or subdivisions thereof, shall be determined in proportion to the population thereof, and credit shall be given to any State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof, for the number of men who were in the military service of the United States as members of the National Guard on April 1, 1917, or who have since said date entered the military service of the United States from any such State, Territory, District, or subdivision, either as members of the Regular Army or the National Guard. All persons drafted into the service of the United States and all officers accepting commissions in the forces herein provided for shall, from the date of said draft or acceptance, be subject to the laws and regulations governing the Regular Army, except as to promotions, so far as such laws and regulations are applicable to persons whose permanent retention in the military service on the active or retired list is not contemplated by existing law, and those drafted shall be required to serve for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged: Provided, That the President is authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment or draft, as herein provided, special and technical troops as he may deem necessary, and to embody them into organizations and to officer them as provided in the third paragraph of section 1 and section 9 of this act. Organizations of the forces herein provided for, except the Regular Army and the divisions authorized in the seventh paragraph of section 1, shall, as far as the interests of the service permit, be composed of men who come, and of officers who are appointed from, the same State or locality.

"SEC. 3. No bounty shall be paid to induce any person to enlist in the military service of the United States; and no person liable to military service shall hereafter be permitted or allowed to furnish a substitute for such service; nor shall any substitute be received, enlisted, or enrolled in the military service of the United States; and no such person shall be permitted to escape such service or to be discharged therefrom prior to the expiration of his term of service by the payment of money or any other valuable thing whatsoever as consideration for his release from military service or liability thereto.

"SEC. 4. That the Vice President of the United States, the officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, regular or duly ordained ministers of religion, students who at the time of the approval of this act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools, and all persons in the military and naval service of the United States shall be exempt from the selective draft herein prescribed; and nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any of the forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well-recognized religious sect or organization at present organized and existing and whose existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organizations, but no person so exempted shall be exempted from service in any capacity that the President shall declare to be noncombatant; and the President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof, or to draft for partial military service only from those liable to draft as in this act provided, persons of the following classes: County and municipal officials; customhouse clerks; persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mails; artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States, and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate; pilots, mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States; persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency; those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable; and those found to be physically or morally deficient. No exemption or exclusion shall continue when a cause therefor no longer exists: Provided, That notwithstanding the exemptions enumerated herein, each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia shall be required to supply its quota in the proportion that its population bears to the total population of the United States.

"The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to create and establish throughout the several States and subdivisions thereof and in the Territories and the District of Columbia local boards, and where, in his discretion, practicable and desirable, there shall be created and established one such local board in each county or similar subdivision in each State, and one for approximately each 30,000 of population in each city of 30,000 population or over, according to the last census taken or estimates furnished by the Bureau of Census of the Department of Commerce. Such boards shall be appointed by the President and shall consist of three or more members, none of whom shall be connected with the Military Establishment, to be chosen from among the local authorities of such subdivisions or from other citizens residing in the subdivision or area in which the respective boards will have jurisdiction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President. Such boards shall have power within their respective jurisdictions to hear and determine, subject to review as hereinafter provided, all questions of exemption under this act, and all questions of or claims for including or discharging individuals or classes of individuals from the selective draft, which shall be made under rules and regulations prescribed by the President, except any and every question or claim for including or excluding or discharging persons or classes of persons from the selective draft under the provisions of this act authorizing the President to exclude or discharge from the selective draft 'persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment, or the effective operation of the military forces, or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency.'

"The President is hereby authorized to establish additional boards, one in each Federal judicial district of the United States, consisting of such number of citizens, not connected with the Military Establishment, as the President may determine, who shall be appointed by the President. The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to establish more than one such board in any Federal judicial district of the United States, or to establish one such board having jurisdiction of an area extending into more than one Federal judicial district.

"Such district boards shall review on appeal and affirm, modify, or reverse any decision of any local board having jurisdiction in the area in which any such district board has jurisdiction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President. Such district boards shall have exclusive original jurisdiction within their respective areas to hear and determine all questions or claims for including or excluding or discharging persons or classes of persons from the selective draft, under the provisions of this act, not included within the original jurisdiction of such local boards.

"The decisions of such district boards shall be final, except that, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, he may affirm, modify, or reverse any such decision.

"Any vacancy in any such local board or district board shall be filled by the President, and any member of any such local board or district board may be removed and another appointed in his place by the President, whenever he considers that the interest of the Nation demands it.

"The President shall make rules and regulations governing the organization and procedure of such local boards and district boards, and providing for and governing appeals from such local boards to such district boards, and reviews of the decisions of any local board by the district board having jurisdiction, and determining and prescribing the several areas in which the respective local boards and district boards shall have jurisdiction, and all other rules and regulations necessary to carry out the terms and provisions of this section, and shall provide for the issuance of certificates of exemption, or partial or limited exemptions, and for a system to exclude and discharge individuals from selective draft.

"SEC. 5. That all male persons between the ages of 21 and 30, both inclusive, shall be subject to registration in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President; and upon proclamation by the President or other public notice given by him or by his direction stating the time and place of such registration it shall be the duty of all persons of the designated ages, except officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, the Navy, and the National Guard and Naval Militia while in the service of the United States, to present themselves for and submit to registration under the provisions of this act; and every such person shall be deemed to have notice of the requirements of this act upon the publication of said proclamation or other notice as aforesaid given by the President or by his direction; and any person who shall willfully fail or refuse to present himself for registration or to submit thereto as herein provided, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, and shall thereupon be duly registered: Provided, That in the call of the docket precedence shall be given, in courts trying the same, to the trial of criminal proceedings under this act: Provided further, That persons shall be subject to registration as herein provided who shall have attained their twenty-first birthday and who shall not have attained their thirty-first birthday on or before the day set for the registration, and all persons so registered shall be and remain subject to draft into the forces hereby authorized, unless exempted or excused therefrom as in this act provided: Provided further, That in the case of temporary absence from actual place of legal residence of any person liable to registration as provided herein such registration may be made by mail under regulations to be prescribed by the President.

"SEC. 6. That the President is hereby authorized to utilize the service of any or all departments and any or all officers or agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and subdivisions thereof, in the execution of this act, and all officers and agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and subdivisions thereof, and of the District of Columbia, and all persons designated or appointed under regulations prescribed by the President whether such appointments are made by the President himself or by the governor or other officer of any State or Territory to perform any duty in the execution of this act, are hereby required to perform such duty as the President shall order or direct, and all such officers and agents and persons so designated or appointed shall hereby have full authority for all acts done by them in the execution of this act by the direction of the President. Correspondence in the execution of this act may be carried in penalty envelopes bearing the frank of the War Department. Any person charged as herein provided with the duty of carrying into effect any of the provisions of this act or the regulations made or directions given thereunder who shall fail or neglect to perform such duty; and any person charged with such duty or having and exercising any authority under said act, regulations, or directions, who shall knowingly make or be a party to the making of any false or incorrect registration, physical examination, exemption, enlistment, enrollment, or muster; and any person who shall make or be a party to the making of any false statement or certificate as to the fitness or liability of himself or any other person for service under the provisions of this act, or regulations made by the President thereunder, or otherwise evades or aids another to evade the requirements of this act or of said regulations, or who, in any manner, shall fail or neglect fully to perform any duty required of him in the execution of this act, shall, if not subject to military law, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, or, if subject to military law, shall be tried by court-martial and suffer such punishment as a court-martial may direct.

"SEC. 7. That the qualifications and conditions for voluntary enlistment as herein provided shall be the same as those prescribed by existing law for enlistments in the Regular Army, except that recruits must be between the ages of 18 and 40 years, both inclusive, at the time of their enlistment; and such enlistments shall be for the period of the emergency unless sooner discharged. All enlistments, including those in the Regular Army Reserve, which are in force on the date of the approval of this act and which would terminate during the emergency shall continue in force during the emergency unless sooner discharged; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to shorten the period of any existing enlistment: Provided, That all persons enlisted or drafted under any of the provisions of this act shall as far as practicable be grouped into units by States and the political subdivisions of the same: Provided further, That all persons who have enlisted since April 1, 1917, either in the Regular Army or in the National Guard, and all persons who have enlisted in the National Guard since June 3, 1916, upon their application, shall be discharged upon the termination of the existing emergency.

"The President may provide for the discharge of any or all enlisted men whose status with respect to dependents renders such discharge advisable; and he may also authorize the employment on any active duty of retired enlisted men of the Regular Army, either with their rank on the retired list or in higher enlisted grades, and such retired enlisted men shall receive the full pay and allowances of the grades in which they are actively employed.

"SEC. 8. That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is authorized to appoint for the period of the existing emergency such general officers of appropriate grades as may be necessary for duty with brigades, divisions, and higher units in which the forces provided for herein may be organized by the President, and general officers of appropriate grade for the several Coast Artillery districts. In so far as such appointments may be made from any of the forces herein provided for, the appointees may be selected irrespective of the grades held by them in such forces. Vacancies in all grades in the Regular Army resulting from the appointment of officers thereof to higher grades in the forces other than the Regular Army herein provided for shall be filled by temporary promotions and appointments in the manner prescribed for filling temporary vacancies by section 114 of the national defense act approved June 3, 1916; and officers appointed under the provisions of this act to higher grades in the forces other than the Regular Army herein provided for shall not vacate their permanent commissions nor be prejudiced in their relative or lineal standing in the Regular Army.

"SEC. 9. That the appointments authorized and made as provided by the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh paragraphs of section 1 and by section 8 of this act, and the temporary appointments in the Regular Army authorized by the first paragraph of section 1 of this act, shall be for the period of the emergency, unless sooner terminated by discharge or otherwise. The President is hereby authorized to discharge any officer from the office held by him under such appointment for any cause which, in the judgment of the President, would promote the public service; and the general commanding any division and higher tactical organization or territorial department is authorized to appoint from time to time military boards of not less than three nor more than five officers of the forces herein provided for to examine into and report upon the capacity, qualification, conduct, and efficiency of any commissioned officer within his command other than officers of the Regular Army holding permanent or provisional commissions therein. Each member of such board shall be superior in rank to the officer whose qualifications are to be inquired into, and if the report of such board be adverse to the continuance of any such officer and be approved by the President, such officer shall be discharged from the service at the discretion of the President with one month's pay and allowances.

"SEC. 10. That all officers and enlisted men of the forces herein provided for other than the Regular Army shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army; and commencing June 1, 1917, and continuing until the termination of the emergency, all enlisted men of the Army of the United States in active service whose base pay does not exceed $21 per month shall receive an increase of $10 per month; those whose base pay is $24, an increase of $8 per month; those whose base pay is $30, $36, or $40, an increase of $6 per month; and those whose base pay is $45 or more, an increase of $5 per month: Provided, That the increases of pay herein authorized shall not enter into the computation of continuous-service pay.

"SEC. 11. That all existing restrictions upon the detail, detachment, and employment of officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army are hereby suspended for the period of the present emergency.

"SEC. 12. That the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army, is authorized to make such regulations governing the prohibition of alcoholic liquors in or near military camps and to the officers and enlisted men of the Army as he may from time to time deem necessary or advisable: Provided, That no person, corporation, partnership, or association shall sell, supply, or have in his or its possession any intoxicating or spirituous liquors at any military station, cantonment, camp, fort, post, officers' or enlisted men's club, which is being used at the time for military purposes under this act, but the Secretary of War may make regulations permitting the sale and use of intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes. It shall be unlawful to sell any intoxicating liquor, including beer, ale, or wine, to any officer or member of the military forces while in uniform, except as herein provided. Any person, corporation, partnership, or association violating the provisions of this section or the regulations made thereunder shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

"SEC. 13. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, empowered, and directed during the present war to do everything by him deemed necessary to suppress and prevent the keeping or setting up of houses of ill fame, brothels, or bawdy houses within such distance as he may deem needful of any military camp, station, fort, post, cantonment, training, or mobilization place, and any person, corporation, partnership, or association receiving or permitting to be received for immoral purposes any person into any place, structure, or building used for the purpose of lewdness, assignation, or prostitution within such distance of said places as may be designated, or shall permit any such person to remain for immoral purposes in any such place, structure, or building as aforesaid, or who shall violate any order, rule, or regulation issued to carry out the object and purpose of this section shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

"SEC. 14. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby suspended during the period of this emergency."

And the Senate agree to the same.

DUTIES OF POST-OFFICE INSPECTORS.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I send to the desk a letter from the Postmaster General, which I ask to have read to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter submitted by the Senator from Missouri will be read.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 11, 1917.

Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR BANKHEAD: I was shocked and surprised when my attention was this morning directed to a statement made on the floor of the Senate yesterday by Senator REED, of Missouri. The statement follows:

"I think it is the custom. I think whenever Mr. Post Office Inspector concludes that he wants to open anybody's mail, he just opens it; and if he has made a mistake and got hold of something that has no evidence of any character in it which he wants he seals the letter up. I think he frequently seals it up, sends it on to its destination, watches, then, to see what transpires, gets the reply letter, and opens it. I think such inspectors flagrantly violate the law with reference to all of these letters at all times."

Evidently Senator REED has been grossly deceived with reference to this matter by some evil-disposed person. Of course, I do not undertake to say what may have been done during the former postal administrations by post-office inspectors in the matter of opening letters, but during this administration there has been only one case where a post-office inspector breached the inviolability of mail matter. In the case referred to the post-office inspector, through overzeal in an effort to apprehend a violator of the law, opened a few letters. When this violation of the law on his part was brought to my attention an order was promptly issued dismissing him from the service, and the fact that the inviolability of the mails had been breached was laid before the grand jury; this action was taken notwithstanding the fact that the post-office inspector who had been guilty of the violation of the law referred to was an ex-soldier and had been connected with the department over 30 years and was an inspector in charge whose record theretofore had been good.

There is now law authorizing post-office inspectors, postmasters, or the Postmaster General to open letters which have been mailed save those reaching the dead-letter office; on the contrary, there is an express statute against it. During this administration this law has been strictly enforced, and I feel sure I am safe in saying that, save the instance above cited, no act by a postal employee in violation of this law can be cited.

I am sure that Senator REED had no purpose to do an injustice and wrong to the post-office inspectors, and that he will be only too glad to make the correction when it is brought to his attention. I am writing you, as chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to request that you bring the matter to Senator REED'S attention, in order that he may know what the truth is about this in so far as the practices and customs of the post-office inspectors under this administration are concerned.

Very sincerely, A. S. BURLESON.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have asked that this letter be read, to the end that the statement of the Postmaster General be given as much publicity as my remarks were given. I am delighted to be assured that the custom and practice to which I referred has been entirely discontinued under the present administration. I hope that the Postmaster General is not mistaken.

The statement that I made was made upon information gained in previous years. As the RECORD will show, I was not permitted to entirely conclude my statement. I believe my remarks were made during the progress of an address by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. In any event, my recollection is quite distinct that before the subject matter had been disposed of I asked the privilege of making a further statement, but, because the Senator from Montana was pressed for time, he asked me not to insist upon making the statement at that moment. I desire to make the statement now which I intended to make at that time.

Through my connection in an official way with the prosecution of criminals and with those who were concerned in the prosecution of criminals, it came to my knowledge that in a number of cases post-office inspectors were acting in concert with the police officers, of Kansas City, at least, and that they were helping those officers to trace down men charged with crime by following their letters through the mails. I never saw a letter opened, of course, but I have been told by the police officers how they had in a number of cases been able to follow a man to his hiding place by having a post-office inspector watch for letters that were being delivered to some near relative or to some sweetheart or to some friend. The practice was never to my knowledge employed for the purpose of merely prying into the private business of people, but was employed with the object of tracing criminals. It has been stated to me by those officers that in some cases letters were skillfully opened, their contents examined, then the letters were skillfully closed and forwarded to their destination. Then the individual to whom the letter was addressed was watched as he mailed the reply letter, and in that way the location of the fugitive was discovered.

I have not the slightest doubt that this custom was general in the United States; there is not the slightest doubt on earth in my mind about it. It was, of course, illegal, but it belonged to that kind of illegal acts which we are all inclined more or less to wink at because the purpose, the object, the end is a laudable one, namely, to punish crime.

Mr. President, I am glad to have the assurance of the Postmaster General that since he has been in office nothing of this kind has occurred. I am very glad, indeed, to present his statement to the Senate, to the end that there may be given to it full and absolute publicity.

WAR TAXATION IN GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I desire to have placed in the RECORD without reading an article on war taxation in Great Britain published in the New Republic for May 12.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

During the 12 months ending March 31 the revenue of the British Government from taxation was nearly $2,600,000,000, almost $1,800,000,000 more than for the last year preceding the war. This additional taxation has not affected the business of the country unfavorably. It has not proved a damper on business enterprise and it has not weakened motives for thrift; not only so, but the taxes have proved positively advantageous. While the standard of life of no class in the community has been seriously lowered, individual consumption of comforts and luxuries has been materially reduced, thus setting free labor and capital for war purposes. Another and even more important advantage has also been secured through the imposition of additional taxation. The evident justice of taxing heavily those whose incomes have risen since the beginning of the war has stimulated the people generally to whole-hearted exertion in every field of economic activity.

In all respects save one the British example affords conclusive ground for the immediate imposition in the United States of taxes as heavy as those now levied in Great Britain. The present scale of these taxes was not adopted at the beginning of the war. Additional taxation was imposed in November, 1914, again in September, 1915, and finally in April, 1916. It is not surprising therefore to find the opinion gaining some currency that we also should adopt a similar course. But here English experience does not yield a valid precedent. It is now generally agreed in Great Britain that the present scale of taxes could with advantage have been imposed at an earlier date, and the reasons for the adoption of the policy of gradual increase of taxation are entirely without force for this country. The cost of modern warfare as well as the duration of the present war were underestimated. The outbreak of war, moreover, occasioned serious dislocation in the trade of the country and a temporary breakdown of the foreign exchanges throughout the world. A moratorium became necessary. Mobilization of a peaceful community for war involved the transfer of a large proportion of the capital and labor of the country from accustomed employments to new uses. None of these conditions is found in the United States at the present time. The entrance of this country into the war does not require anything in the nature of a revolutionary change in our economic activities. Trade with the countries with which we are now at war has long since been at a standstill—the war itself will simply intensify certain influences which have been potent factors in the situation during the last two years. In these circumstances there is not the slightest ground for holding that we can not assume at once and without difficulty the burden of taxation which our British allies have gradually imposed upon themselves and which is to be increased in the budget of the current year.

The backbone of the British structure of taxation is the income tax. The provisions of the law are highly complicated and only the most salient features can be indicated in a short article. Only those with incomes under £130 a year are exempt. Those with incomes between £130 and £400 are allowed an abatement of £120, those with incomes between £400 and £600 an abatement of £100, and between £600 and £700 an abatement of £70. All persons with incomes under £700 are also allowed an abatement of £25 for each child. Those whose income exceeds £700 are taxed on the entire amount.

The lowest rate of the tax is now 2s. 3d. in the pound, or 11¼ per cent on earned incomes under £500. On unearned incomes of £500, that is, incomes derived from investments, the rate is 3s. in the pound. A man with an earned income of £500, thanks to the abatement of £120 and allowing for an abatement of £75 for three children, would then pay a tax of 2s. 3d. on £325, which is equivalent to $183 or 7½ per cent on his entire income of $2,500. From this rate of 2s. 3d. on incomes under £500 the rates advance by a succession of steps until 5s. in the pound or a 25 per cent tax is levied upon the entire amount of unearned incomes of £2,000, and on all earned incomes of £2,500, 5s. in the pound is the standard rate. It is interesting to note that incomes of $4,000 which are entirely exempt in this country are subject to a 12½ per cent tax if earned and to a tax of 17½ per cent if derived from investments.

All income in excess of £2,500 is further subject to supertaxes which also advance in a succession of steps from 10d. on the first £500 of excess to 3s. 6d. on all income over £10,000. A man, then, with an income of $250,000 would pay a tax of 25 per cent on $12,500, higher rates on successive parts of his income up to $50,000, and 42½ per cent on all income in excess of that amount. Income-tax rates were materially increased in April, 1914, but the present income-tax rates in Great Britain impose a burden which ranges from two and one-half to three and one half times that which rested upon taxpayers before the war. For the year ending March 31, 1914, income-tax revenue was only £47,250,000; for the year ending March 31, 1916, the huge sum of £205,033,000 was secured from this source. When account is taken of the British income tax it becomes positively ludicrous for anyone to style as confiscatory the proposal now under consideration to impose a 40 or even 50 per cent tax on the excess of income over $1,000,000.

In virtually all the belligerent countries, excessive profits taxes have been imposed since the beginning of the war. The principle of these taxes is quite unlike the tax on profits above a definite return on capital to which the same name has been given in this country. The English excess profits tax is designed to secure for the State a part of those profits which, generally speaking, are definitely due to the war. In November, 1915, a tax of 50 per cent (raised to 60 per cent in April, 1916) was imposed on all profits in excess of the average profits of each business during two of the last three years preceding the war, the taxpayer being permitted to select the two years which are to serve as a base. This tax has proved unexpectedly remunerative, yielding a revenue of nearly £140,000,000 during the last 12 months. It has not crippled industry. The business community generally has recognized that it is a proper war-revenue measure. For the current year rate of the tax has been advanced from 60 to 80 per cent.

In addition to the income and excess profits taxes, there has been a considerable increase in indirect taxation. Following the wise British tradition, heavy taxes have been imposed on a few articles rather than a multitude of duties and excises on many commodities and services. The duty on tea has been increased from 10 cents to 25 cents a pound; on coffee and cocoa a duty of 10 cents a pound is levied; and on sugar a duty of 3½ cents a pound. These, together with a very considerable increase in the duties on gasoline, tobacco, and alcoholic beverages, are the principal sources from which additional revenue has been derived by means of indirect taxation. Taking customs and excise duties together there has been an increase in revenue from £75,000,000 in 1914 to £127,000,000 for the year ending March 31, 1917. These indirect taxes are indeed high, but it is rightly felt that every class in the community should bear a part of the burden of the war. Moreover, the demand for labor has been greatly intensified. Wages have advanced to such an extent since the outbreak of the war that it is even said that the poorer half of the population, notwithstanding the taxes, is now enjoying greater comfort than ever before. This is a result of war conditions which may well be emphasized in this country, where it has been urged in some quarters that taxes on such articles as sugar and coffee might seriously lower the standard of life of large numbers of the people.

Rates of taxation in this country similar to those now imposed in Great Britain would doubtless yield a much larger sum, since our population is more than twice as numerous. Presumably also the scale of money incomes is somewhat higher. These taxes might therefore be expected to yield a sum sufficient to meet a very considerable part of the war expenditures of the Government during the next 12 months. It would not, of course, be possible to adopt the English taxes without important modifications. It would hardly be feasible to reduce the exemption to $650. Comparatively high exemption in the United States is probably necessary because of the large number of small farmers, most of whom keep no accounts. The reduction of the exemption to $2,000 would seem to be clearly desirable, and probably to $1,500. Owing to this much higher exemption, in order to secure anything like equivalent results, it would be necessary to impose indirect taxes upon a somewhat large number of commodities than are subject to such taxes in Great Britain.

The details of a complete scheme of taxation bristle with difficulties. These can, however, be overcome if it is kept clearly in mind that it is both equitable and desirable to meet the costs of war to the very greatest extent possible during the contest. English experience furnishes us with ample evidence that a country at war can endure heavy taxation. It should also silence the objection that heavy income taxes are confiscatory an objection which betokens a lack of patriotism and which has been strikingly conspicuous by its absence among the heavily taxed people of Great Britain.

Any considerable increase in the rates of income taxation in this country should be accompanied by many changes in the administrative features of the present law. That law is now unsatisfactory both from the point of view of the Government and of the taxpayer. In particular, it contains many undesirable deductions which, while satisfactory to those who enjoy them, are inequitable to the mass of taxpayers. Deductions from income are, for exemple, now allowed for interest on loans secured by securities, the income from which is exempt from taxation. It is most unfortunate that the forthcoming issue of Government bonds is to be a tax-exempt security. It gives to purchasers of large wealth with income subject to heavy income taxes an undeserved advantage over those with small incomes, an advantage which is not fully offset for the Government in a better price for its bonds. A 3½ per cent tax-exempt Government bond will yield very nearly as much as a 6 per cent taxable bond to those with incomes in excess of a million dollars if such incomes are subjected to a 40 per cent tax. To those with small incomes the exemption is of little or no value. It is a most undemocratic arrangement, which will surely tend toward an undesirable concentration of ownership of the bonds. This unsatisfactory prospect is made even worse by the present right to deduct from taxable income, interest on loans secured by the tax-exempt bonds. Again, the net rental value of a house occupied by its owner is not included as income for taxation purposes and interest on the mortgage of such a house may be deducted from taxable income. House owners have therefore a double advantage over those who pay rent, all of whose income is subject to taxation. Defects in the income-tax law become more and more serious as the rates are increased. It will in some degree reconcile taxpayers to increased burdens if they feel that the provisions of the law are fair and equitable.

OLIVER M. W. SPRAGUE.

RECESS.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m., Tuesday, May 15, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 16, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 15, 1917.

The House met at 10.30 a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Lord of all, whose balance trieth the nations, Thou hast established us as a people and laid upon us a mighty trust. Make all who speak or act for this Nation true organs of Thine equity; that through their wisdom and faithfulness Thou mayst be our Lawgiver and Judge; that righteousness may be the girdle of our power; that thus we may hallow Thy Name, in the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 291) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes, had insisted upon its amendment, had asked a conference with the House of Representatives on the said bill and the amendment thereto, and had appointed Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. NELSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

WAR REVENUE.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4280, the war-revenue bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the war-revenue bill, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I am taking this occasion to have read into the RECORD an amendment which I desire to have considered by the Members of the House. It is to section 1000, found on page 47 of the bill, and the particular part to which the amendment will be offered has reference to the following language:

And if not now dutiable by law a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem.

In other words, I seek to amend the section that imposes a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem on free-listed articles as they now exist. I have prepared an amendment which I shall present at the proper time releasing certain articles from the operation of this clause. In other words, if my amendment should prevail the 10 per cent ad valorem that might be imposed by this act, if enacted in its present condition, would be taken off the articles named in the amendment. I will ask the Clerk to read the amendment in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: Page 47, line 22, after the word "valorem," insert:

"(b) Barks, cinchona or other, from which quinine may be extracted.

"(c) Books, engravings, photographs, etchings, bound or unbound, maps, and charts imported by authority or for the use of the United States or for the use of the Library of Congress.

"(e) Guano, manures, and all substances used only for manure.

"(f) Iodine, crude or resublimed.

"(g) Lifeboats and life-saving apparatus specially imported by societies and institutions incorporated or established to encourage the saving of human life.

"(h) Miners' rescue appliances, designed for emergency use in mines where artificial breathing is necessary in the presence of poisonous gases, to aid in the saving of human life, and miners' safety lamps and parts, accessories, and appliances for cleaning, repairing, and operating all the foregoing.

"(i) Nux vomica.

"(j) Phosphates, crude.

"(n) Strychnia or strychnine.

"(o) Nitrate of soda."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD].

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, as best I may I have been undertaking to study the bill to find out, if possible, if there is any basic principle of taxation according to which the bill has been framed. Many gentlemen have suggested to me that if there were any irregularities and irreconcilable objections, it would be well to pass it on to the Senate and let the Senate correct whatever irregularities there may be. It does not seem to me proper for the House, in which revenue bills must originate, to move with such haste that the Senate will have to scrutinize our work carefully and correct all of the inequalities in the bill. For many days people from my own district who are profoundly interested in the provisions of the bill have written to me, as others have written to you gentlemen, with regard to the effect that it will have upon their business. My own conviction was, as I listened to the gentlemen who had the bill in charge and talked privately with one gentleman particularly who has been very active in its preparation, that but little time would be given for its consideration. I am glad to know that the three or four days which he said would be sufficient for its consideration have been lengthened. It may be, after all, that the old adage that haste makes waste is truer here than elsewhere. I am not convinced that a bill which levies $1,800,000,000 in direct taxes should be quickly passed, with all due deference to the wisdom and ability of the Committee on Ways and Means.

This bill seems to have been written in secret largely, and now we are permitted to listen to the evidence in the case. May I not say that just because a man is unwilling to swallow the bill wholesale he is not therefore to be put down as objecting to the raising of war revenue? Much time has been taken by gentlemen here who insist upon the fact that they are patriotic and that we are in war, as if any man facing the tremendous responsibilities of having voted for the war and for the raising of seven billions of dollars, and then facing the problem to-day of voting $1,800,000,000 in direct taxes, could forget for one moment that we are at war. So that it seems to me it is uncalled for for men to make such protestations of their patriotism in connection with this bill and expect that those statements will secure immunity of criticism on the bill itself. The gentlemen who have led here have disclaimed that they had any basic or fundamental principle upon which the bill is drawn. Indeed, if I remember correctly, some of the leaders have said that they would shut their eyes and vote for it because we are at war. It is quite true that we are at war, but it may be, as gentlemen have suggested, that this is but the beginning of vast sums that are still to be raised, and if that be true, we ought to scan carefully the bill and put it in such form as that when we face the people of the country we shall not be ashamed of the vote that we have cast.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman believe that we ought to collect the amount of money provided for in this bill, $1,800,000,000?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I do.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman so far has not criticized the bill except the method of making it up, but when he comes to the criticism of the items I suggest that he impart to the House the manner in which he would make up the bill and the items he would substitute for the ones which he criticizes.

Mr. MANN. That is not necessary.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. No; not necessary; but I might suggest to the gentleman that if we are going to put a direct tax of 5 per cent upon the wholesale price of any commodity, why would it not be fair not to pick out any particular industry but to take the selling price of commodities of all industries, and the volume of business is so great in this country that the effect would be distributed throughout every industry, rather than having it rest basically upon two or three?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman think that there are only two or three industries that pay 5 per cent?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Oh, no; but not by any means all of the industries, nor all of the business of the country, will pay 5 per cent.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is the gentleman aware that there are some industries that will pay a very much larger per cent?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Which these gentlemen who are talking about this 5 per cent entirely overlook.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. No; I do not.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Illinois injects that it makes it so much the worse, which shows the gentleman from Illinois has not read the bill——

Mr. MANN. I have read the bill probably more than the Committee on Ways and Means have done.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have heard the sneering remarks of the gentleman from Illinois before; because he has not studied it——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman commenced it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Illinois commenced it and has been doing it right along.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I will listen for a question. Let me say in regard to these high percentages I do not know, gentlemen, but that ultimately we may believe that an opportunity to do business with 100,000,000 of people in this country is a natural resource, and while in another day men who led on to conquer would have the control of territory to draw therefrom, is it not true that the captains of industry have 100,000,000 of people as a natural resource and that thereby the added percentages that go to excess profits is but a fair return for the opportunity that those men have more than their greater ability, granting such a thing, I believe in it, as mastership in industry. Yet it is true that mastership in industry would have nothing upon which to work were there not millions of people upon whom they can exercise their intellectual ability. And so I do not think these taxes are exorbitant. The problem always in taxation is not altogether of how much it will take but of how much you will leave so that the small industries may not be paralyzed. I think the members of the committee have very frankly recognized that there are some inequalities in the bill. I think they have very frankly recognized that the proposition of billposter advertising is excessive in the taxes that are imposed. We had an example of the manner in which the bill has been drawn in connection with the carbonic-acid gas schedule yesterday.

I know, gentlemen, that a thing like that might slip in, for men had their minds intent upon the larger features of the bill, and yet if that might slip in, may it not be that a further discussion of the bill and a clearer analysis and hearing from men who are directly interested—men whose business is involved—may it not be that it would be wise to pause long enough to see that when the bill is finally passed it shall be reasonably fair? I want to say now that I have not been impressed with the idea that we do not need this amount of money. I think we do, and before long we will need much more, and I believe that the people of this country will rally if they feel that Congress has exercised due care in preserving a fair distribution of these taxes upon the industries. I note that it has been customary here when the automobile industry is spoken of to treat it laughingly, and perhaps most of us have been inclined to look upon the automobile industry as a gold mine and that those industries could be plucked without injury. There is in my district not far from my own home an automobile industry, and the gentlemen who are interested in that have submitted to me some figures in connection with their industry that I want to get before this House. I have known something of how that industry developed. Starting many years ago as wagon makers and buggy builders, slowly, carefully, through long years, this industry was built up, and the men who conduct it were so honest that their names became a synonym for worthy output, and when these men come to me and frankly say to me that their industry is in danger I am not disposed to laugh or sneer. A sneer is not an argument after all, and a loud laugh is not a demonstration, and so it may be that it is wise to look closer at some of these smaller industries to see whether or not we are doing them an injustice. [Applause.]

I should like to submit the following facts relative to the costs and profits of the automobile manufacturing company of which I speak as submitted to me by their officers:

FACTS RELATIVE TO BUSINESS.

The 1917 series of cars as planned includes:

Of model 6-39, 6-cylinder automobiles	2,600
Of model 6-44, 6-cylinder automobiles	400
Total number planned for and for which merchandise is purchased	3,000

Of this, 1,652 still remain unsold, 600 being in the hands of dealers—this number is estimated from reports of salesmen and dealers—and 1,052 cars are still at the factory unsold.

The cost on these 1917 series of cars as figured December 14, 1916, based on costs of materials as purchased then and on labor and overhead costs as records showed for the season just then closed:

Model 6-39.

Material	$689.89
Producing labor	38.35
Overhead, consisting of nonproductive factory labor, office, sales, and advertising costs, freight, drayage, taxes, and insurance	73.68
Total cost	801.92

At the present time the increased cost of the productive labor is full 40 per cent, which makes an increase of $15.34, or a cost of $817.26.

This model of car is now being sold at list price of $1,145, less 25 per cent, leaving a net sale of $858.75, which figures a net profit, according to the first estimate, of $56.83 per car, but now with advanced cost figures a net profit of $41.49 per car.

The proposed tax of 5 per cent on list price on this car would figure a tax of $57.25, thus calling for more than all of the net profit.

On the Model 6-44 car, figured on the same basis of costs as above stated on December 14, 1916, the costs are as follows:

Model 6-44.

Material	$956.44
Productive factory labor	38.35
Overhead expense, consisting of nonproductive factory labor, office sales and advertising, drayage, freight, taxes, and insurance	73.68
Total	1,068.47

At the present time 40 per cent must be added to cost of productive labor, same as above, to the amount of $15.34, making a net cost of $1,083.81. This model of car is now being sold at a list price of $1,535, less 25 per cent, leaving a net sale price of $1,151.25, which would have netted a profit of $82.78 on the original cost estimate, but now leaves profit of $67.44 at present cost of labor.

The proposed tax of 5 per cent on the list price of this car would be $76.75, or more than our entire profit.

The costs of material for these same cars, figuring on present prices of material, which must govern purchases for the 1918 series of cars, will be an advance of fully $100 per car, with the prospect that prices of material will still be greatly increased beyond the present ones.

If the proposed tax goes into effect, with the advanced costs of material, the company would be compelled to advance the list prices on the next series of cars—from which the bulk of revenue must be realized—at least $200 per car, thus making the list price on the 6-39 car $1,345, which would be so much that it would be impossible to make sales.

Also note that this 6-39 car, now listed at $1,145, was first listed at $1,050 in the summer of 1916, and the company was compelled by the advanced costs prior to the figure of December 14, 1916, to raise the list price to $1,145.

It will be gleaned from the above that this law will take more than the net profits from this industry. What is true of this particular plant is true of nearly every small plant in this country manufacturing automobiles and automobile trucks. Of the 450 automobile companies of the country only 12 may be considered as among the larger factories. This bill will drive their competitors out of business and yield to these large industries the whole field without competition. More than that it will deprive thousands upon thousands of workmen and their families of a means of subsistence. It will harm the industry of every community where such an industry is located. What is true of the automobile industry will be true also of many another industry. The truth is that a blanket 5 per cent on particular industries picked out here and there because it is thought that they can be made to pay is vicious in itself. If a law can at all be defended by which the blanket tax of a certain per cent upon the total selling output of any industry, why not extend it to all industries. Under such conditions the tax would be fairly distributed. So vast is the total output of the industries of this country that the tax upon the wholesale selling price of all those industries would be small indeed, and it would not bear heavily upon anyone. As I said in the beginning, if there had been any basic principle upon which this bill is drawn, we would not find ourselves in this condition when considering it. I certainly hope that the bill will be modified sufficiently so that men who have some self-respect with regard to the manner in which taxes should be apportioned will be able to support it. It has come to me that the committee has already prepared a bill in which they are incorporating many amendments, so that some of the inequalities of this bill shall at least be taken out of it. Many men think at this time that it is unwise to alarm and disturb business conditions by attempting to raise such a vast amount the first year. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the administration wants revenue from direct taxation to the amount of $1,500,000,000, and has served notice upon the Senate and House of Representatives, which latter originates revenue. That is as far as the administration has the right to go. The House of Representatives is now engaged in the business of originating that revenue, and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House have reported a bill which, as I understand, from sitting here a number of days and listening to the committee, does not satisfy any member of that committee. They come in here with a bill which they say, after they have sugar-coated it with oratory and wit, that we want to shut our eyes when we swallow it. The committee seem to be disgusted with the bill, and on several matters all Members of this House must be disgusted. It is for the House, after discussing this bill in a calm, dispassionate way, without prejudice or passion or party, to say whether in this bill, made up as it is of so many different elements, before we swallow it, we are taking poison; whether there are in this bill elements that are to destroy certain American industries; for after we pass the bill, gentlemen, we can not shift our responsibility as Representatives onto the President or on the administration or on any department of the Government. We must take the responsibility with the people. We have been hearing from home and from nearly every industry. We ought to make up our minds at this time whether many of those industries will live and survive under this bill or will be destroyed and perish under it. We ought to get a bill, gentlemen, with the resources of this great country, the richest Nation on the face of the earth, sufficient to raise this amount of revenue by direct taxation without crippling or destroying any single American industry—legal, legitimate, or lawful industry. And, incidentally, we ought to get a bill with revenue enough without legalizing and protecting the liquor traffic of the Nation. Perhaps it is out of order to discuss this at this time, but I hope before we get through with the business of this Congress we may have an opportunity to conduct the affairs of this Government without the aid of the liquor traffic. [Applause.]

I want to call your attention one moment to some features of the bill to which I object and which I think ought to be eliminated. For instance, that part of the income tax that is retroactive, going back into the past, into 1916, after the Government had collected its tax, and the returns have been made and business has adjusted itself to 1916 and corporations and individuals have settled their business for that year with a knowledge of how much they shall pay, and this throws upon them at this late hour the fact that they must have a second tax, and it will demoralize the business of the country. And I say if you want to put upon the individuals and the corporations that pay an income tax for the future a heavier tax, I shall not object to it, if they can stand it, and I think they can. But to go back into the past I object to, for two reasons; one is that it is unconstitutional, in my opinion, and the second is that it is not fair and honest.

I object to second-class postage being increased, because it will demoralize the business of the country. The great business of publishing newspapers—not the big newspapers, but the newspapers in the country towns, the newspapers that are struggling for existence under the high price of print paper at the present time—will be demoralized and destroyed. I come from a district of three counties, in which there are two daily papers, and they are struggling for existence. They go from the one large city in my district into county towns. They pay postage. If you pass this bill as it stands, doubling the second-class postage, they must go out of business, and every newspaper in my district must go out of business.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Is it not possible for those newspapers to collect larger subscriptions? Why should they go out of business?

Mr. HERSEY. I think if they should attempt to collect larger subscriptions from their subscribers—and it would not look well to try to increase your subscription by putting on the amount of postage; they must put it larger than that—they would lose their subscription list.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Let me also add that at this time, owing to the high burdens imposed by the cost of materials and paper, those papers are having all they can do to get along now, without additional impositions.

Mr. HERSEY. I know that is true. They are not making any money, and besides the newspapers of this country, whether they are country papers or city papers, if they have any income, if they are making any income, the individual or corporation pays an income tax. Put it on the income. If they make excess profits, you can tax them under this bill. Put it on the excess profits, but do not destroy the industries of this country.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. HERSEY. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Can you offer any reason why the Government should do this business for the newspapers for nothing?

Mr. HERSEY. I do not think they are doing it for nothing.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. They certainly are charging only $11,000,000 a year for doing $99,000,000 worth of business.

Mr. HERSEY. Well, if we believe some figures presented yesterday by a member of the committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, the Government is not losing anything on the matter of postage. Whether they are or whether they are not, that is no reason why you should work an injustice to any industry in this country. The Government may lose postage. They should lose it rather than to lose the industries of this country which contribute toward the wealth and prosperity of the Nation.

Now, there are other sources of income for this great Nation at the present time besides that of trying to cripple some industry like the country newspaper. This committee came into the House with a 10 per cent raise upon the customs duties. There is no reason why you can not raise it more, if you want to, without injuring the industries of this country. It would be a protection to the industries of this country. It is an admission, of course, that you can not run this Nation at the present time under free trade. There is to be a great war debt upon this country at the close of the war. We paid one war debt from the customhouse. We pensioned the soldiers, the widows, and the orphans from the customhouse. We redeemed the greenback and made it as good as gold from the customhouse. We built up this Nation through its industries to be the greatest manufacturing Nation on the globe by a high protective tariff. You will have to have it again. You might as well commence the policy now. The administration admits that they made a mistake by free trade. So they put back the duty on sugar. They enacted a law which they called an antidumping law, I think, to keep foreign labor and production from interfering with the American industry. Now, they come with a 10 per cent raise on the duties, creeping back with an excuse, on account of the war, into what they know is a necessity—a protective tariff in this Nation. After the war the Nation must come to the tariff of McKinley and of Dingley. [Applause on the Republican side.] You might as well commence now to raise your revenue, to come back to the tariff of McKinley and of Dingley, and save the industries of this country from extermination [Applause.]

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. HERSEY. Yes.

Mr. REED. I am very much interested in what the gentleman says, especially about crippling the industries. Has the gentleman considered this, that in the first two years of our so-called war prosperity, according to Dun and Bradstreet, the mortality of the industries of this country was increased 50 per cent the first two years of the war, in both the liabilities and in the number of concerns, in business failures? I say that we can cripple industries and make more failures, just as you have said.

Mr. HERSEY. We agree all right on that.

Mr. REED. We agree on it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the bill which we are now considering is one which would not be tolerated for one moment if the country was at peace. This sacrifice which the American people are called upon to make is a sacrifice which they are called upon to make because we are at war.

The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. KITCHIN], in presenting this bill to the House at the opening of this debate, only justifies it upon that ground. His position is that of the patriot. He is always sincere in every utterance and in every vote which he casts. It is most fortunate for the masses of the people at this time that a man of his type and mold should be chairman of this great committee. If he lived in New York, Indiana, or Ohio, he would be the next nominee of the Democratic Party for President. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I will not discuss in detail the items of this bill. I will in the short time allotted me state my views on the situation.

If I were called upon to outline a method of winning this war, I would first say that it is essentially necessary that you get public sentiment aroused and popularize the war. The idea that heretofore prevailed among the Army officers of Europe as well as of America of "the public be damned" has been dissipated in every country in Europe. And unless we do popularize the war we will, if we win it at all, win it by pursuing the line of greatest resistance and not the line of least resistance.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I prefer not to be interrupted—at least, for the present.

In order to popularize the war you must first convince the American people that we are engaged in a righteous war. You must convince the honest American heart that this war not only will benefit them in their liberty, in their freedom, but that it will also benefit the liberty and freedom of people throughout the world. You must also convince the American people that, in the conduct of the war and in the organization of all of the machinery necessary to win the war, we are not destroying our liberty and our freedom here at home. [Applause.] We must convince the people that we are not endeavoring to destroy government by one man, or government by men, in Europe and establish there a government by law and leave any doubt in the minds of American people that you may be replacing here a government by men for a government by law. [Applause.] If there is one thing that is fundamental in the mind of every great statesman, it is this, that every free government must not only be administered so that every man has equal opportunities, but must also be a government that is administered under and by law; and these rules of law must be applicable to all people alike, and must be made for their benefit and for their happiness in the conduct of their affairs. I believe in a government by law, and not by a man.

It took a great deal of treasure and a great deal of blood to establish this principle here.

Now, there are certain evidences that we may show to the American people whether or not we are in dead earnest about this being a war of sacrifice on the part of all the American people. It will not do to give the people lip service here in this Hall. You have got to give them that service that will show that you are in dead earnest about this being a war of sacrifice. You can not let this be a war where men shall gather around the Capitol and the War Department and the Navy Department and get contracts, out of which they shall make enormous profits and mighty fortunes, and expect the people to be enthusiastic about the war when they are the only ones who are called upon to make sacrifice. You will, Mr. Chairman, make extremely slow progress in popularizing this war. What is needed above all things is to arouse some enthusiasm and determination on the part of the people to win in this world war. It is not enough to have the General Staff and Army officers enthused.

When you take the young man from 21 to 31 years of age and put him in the ranks, when you take him by conscription, you are taking the best years of his life; you are taking frequently from the home that idol which they would give all that there is in the world to keep at home; and when you ask the mother and the father of small means, who are barely eking out enough to make tongue and buckle meet, gentlemen of the House, you can not make them believe that this war is a righteous one if you have taken their boy and taxed them besides this and let them understand that at that selfsame hour men have contracts with the Army and Navy out of which they are making princely fortunes. [Applause.]

Therefore, in order that you may popularize this war among the people it is necessary that the people who have these vast incomes shall make great sacrifices. There was a little paper that came upon your desk, I presume, because it came upon mine, signed by about 15 men of great influence, among them notably a multimillionaire of the State of California, and in that document, to my utter amazement, these men of great wealth said that it was not a fair measure of taxation; that you should make the rate of taxation small on the small income, because if you take from a man of a thousand dollars income even 4 per cent, or a man of $2,000 income 4 per cent, making a small amount in itself, yet it would be perhaps an enormous amount relatively and require some self-denial on his part, whereas in this same document it is said that if from a man of a million dollars income you were to take $900,000 and leave $100,000 remaining for the support of his family, you would simply be depriving him of an opportunity for investing for future profits $900,000, but when you take $900,000 from him you have done his family no injury, because even then they would make no such sacrifice as the man of a small income would make even in paying a much smaller rate.

Mr. Chairman, I will now quote from the pamphlet which I have just mentioned. It is headed, "Who Shall Pay for the War," and is signed by 19 business men, and the paper was issued from 60 Broadway, New York. I quote somewhat at length, because of the source of this remarkable document which breathes a spirit of patriotism which should encourage us all.

On the subject of wages it says:

WAGES.

The increase in wages and incomes has been insignificant in comparison to the enormous rise in prices. Undoubtedly wages have advanced sharply since the war began. In some industries they have risen in a spectacular manner, yet the average wage increase since 1912 has been small, even in union labor, when compared with the rise in the prices in necessaries of life. The index figures published in the April Review of the United States Bureau of Labor statistics show that in the large field of union labor there has been a rise of only 9 points from 1912 to 1916, inclusive. Index figures for 1917 are not yet available, but even if we were to assume that wages have risen as much in the first four months of 1917 as they rose in the whole period from 1912 to 1916, which would be a quite extravagant estimate, we should only have a rise of 18 per cent from 1912 to 1917, while according to Dun certain particularly important food products and necessaries have risen from 46 per cent to 105 per cent in the last three years, and according to the Times Annalist the cost of the food budget of the average American family has gone up 74 per cent in the last two years.

We can not but accept the unwelcome fact that the average American has not in reality shared in the prosperity of the country during the war period. On the contrary, he has lost ground in the economic struggle, in spite of the Nation's advancing aggregate wealth. Wages and incomes have no doubt increased, but there has been at the same time such an inflation in the price of things people must buy in order to live that the average citizen's purchasing power has been steadily diminished. He has been handed more in his pay envelope; he has received a larger salary check and made better earnings from his farm or his business, but in turning the money he has made into food, fuel, rent, household furnishings, etc., he has found that it does not go so far as in times when wages and earnings were much smaller.

WHERE THE TAXABLE WEALTH IS.

Where, then, has the Nation's prosperity gone since the world war began—into whose pockets? And, above all, where may we find the accumulations of wealth which may now be taxed to pay for the war with the least hardship or injustice to the public?

The following figures, selected almost at random from the great list of industrial corporations that have profited by war times, may suggest the answers to the above questions. They may also indicate the economic conditions which lie below the fact reported by Prof. King, of the University of Wisconsin, that 2 per cent of the people of the United States own 65 per cent of the country's total wealth.

[1] Deficit.

Taking 24 of the principal companies listed above and comparing their earnings in 1914 and 1916, we find in these two years an increase of 500 per cent, and these increases may be expected to continue. For instance, the steel corporations' last quarter's earning, just published, would indicate, that; for if the percentage is maintained for the whole year, the net sum applicable to dividends for 1917 should be about $450,000,000.

Comparing the increased earnings and the increased stock values of two of these corporations, we get a still more concrete idea of the increased wealth which offers the country a ready source of war taxation:

United States Steel Corporation.

Net earnings 1914	$23,496,768
Net earnings 1916	271,531,730
Increase	248,034,962

Bethlehem Steel Corporation.

Net earnings 1914	$5,590,020
Net earnings 1916	43,593,968
Increase	38,003,948
Average market value of outstanding stock in 1914	17,536,690
Average market value of outstanding stock in 1916	106,112,130
Increase	88,575,440

RAILROADS.

Shareholders of railroads have also improved their position as investors since the war began.

In 1913 the net operating revenue ran approximately from $275 a mile in January to $300 a mile in December. In 1916 the net operating revenue ran approximately from $337 a mile in January to $550 in October.

The net revenue for railroads earning over a million dollars annually for the six months ending January 1, 1917, was practically $700,000,000, which is the largest profit in the history of American railroading.

TAX THE LARGE INCOMES.

Summarizing again we have the immediate necessity of raising immense funds for the Government by bonds and certificates of indebtedness. To pay for these bonds and certificates of indebtedness we have on the one hand the great body of the people and on the other the people of large means. The former, the average citizens, are of moderate means; their average income is less than $1,000 a year, a sum which is continually decreasing in its purchasing power, and is already hardly sufficient to meet the barest necessities of life. These people will do the bulk of the fighting in war time, simply because they compose the bulk of the population. But they can not, and in commonest justice should not, bear anything but a comparatively insignificant part of the war's financial burden. Moreover, they should not be handicapped at such a time by such a burden. The efficiency, the physical condition of this great class that must defend and feed the country should be carefully preserved. They should not be subjected to the anxiety and the hardships that further inroads on their slender incomes or earnings would undoubtedly cause.

Seeking a source of war revenue, we turn from the average citizen to the people of means, who have accumulated wealth under their country's flag and institutions. They can not bear the main burden of defending the Nation in the field or on the sea, because there are not enough of them. But they can and should bear the money burden, and no doubt will be glad to do so if properly impressed with their responsibility. They are financially strong, and they can finance the war from their surplus wealth practically without personal hardship. To them, to their patriotism and willingness to offer to the country whatever it requires, we must look in this hour of general and mutual obligation which the great family of American citizenship has assumed.

A large war tax even to the point of taking all above an income of $100,000 a year would not in any way cripple or discourage these more fortunate citizens. Certainly there should be a tax on small incomes, although the increasing cost of living will probably be tax enough on the average family; and for this reason any income tax on them should be small indeed and graduated so that the burden of actual inconvenience and self-denial shall be equalized as far as possible. The measure of all war taxation should be its effect on the life, health, and happiness of each class of citizenship rather than the size of the contribution made to the Government. All should give in accordance with how much they can give short of distress.

EFFECT OF LARGE TAX ON LARGE INCOMES.

Reducing large incomes for the period of the war and until the war debt is paid (and soon paid) will have a salutary effect on the country. It will tend everywhere to economy and thrift, which, by reducing the demand for luxuries, will lower the cost of necessaries to the general public, whereas the alternative of creating huge bond issues and leaving them unretired for years inevitably tends to inflation, to extravagance, and to raising the cost of living, already an oppressive burden.

RICH INDORSE PLAN.

Along this line Mr. E. W. Scripps, the millionaire newspaper owner of California, said in a memorandum which he sent to the Ways and Means Committee:

"From the source which none of us have yet even dreamed—that of the infliction of a great war—we may draw the greatest reform and the greatest blessings to our people. * * *

"Some of us have very large incomes, and we are prompted, and even by the opinions of society compelled, to indulge in great extravagances. We employ servants who produce nothing for the common good and only minister to our vices. We purchase costly and showy clothing, houses, food, furniture, automobiles, jewelry, etc., the production of which has taken the labor of many hundreds of thousands of men and women, who, if they were not so employed, would be producing other commodities in such quantity as to cheapen them and make them more accessible to the poor

"An enormously high rate of income tax would have the effect of diverting all this labor that is given to practically useless things into other channels where production would be useful to the whole people. * * *

"In the case of the Government of the United States the income is so enormous that out of it could be paid double the amount that the war is costing England annually, and except for the disturbances and readjustment the people of the country would suffer not at all, while they would be greatly benefited by the discipline and the necessity of thinking hard, and perhaps working harder."

Such a policy of paying the war bonds and certificates by taxes on large incomes (assuming that the rich will not evade such taxes, but cooperate patriotically in the effort to have them collected) will materially rehabilitate the very wealthy in the estimation of the public, and it will also make the citizens of smaller means who go to the front feel that they are being loyally supported by the Nation's more fortunate classes.

Speaking of such men, Mr. Scripps said:

"These men, to a large extent at least, suffer extremely from what they feel is the unjust judgment of the great mass of people. * * *

"Now, all of a sudden there is presented to them an opportunity—the Nation's great need for great sums of money—to show their patriotism, to show that they are really unselfish.

"When a man by the practice of business has acquired the habit of investing money profitably it is very difficult for him and really very painful for him to pour out his money in so-called philanthropy; because their own experience and observation have proved to them that the means of philanthropy are generally very wasteful; that it takes from 50 to 75 cents out of every $1 so invested to pay the middle men and the overhead charges; so that only from 25 to 50 cents of the $1 spent ever becomes a real investment. To such men it is a godsend to have the Government come along and take away as an income tax and an inheritance tax their burdensome surplusses."

That this view is shared by business men throughout the country is evidenced by the telegram quoted below, which is one of many similar expressions received from similar sources:

"American Committee on War Finance, 60 Broadway, N. Y.: A board of directors of St. Paul Association of Public and Business Affairs, the big civic and commercial organization of St. Paul, last night adopted with one dissenting vote the following resolution:

"'Whereas many hundreds or thousands of American citizens are to be called upon for the supreme patriotic sacrifice, pledging their lives for their country; and

"'Whereas the least that those remaining at home can do in any measure even approaching the sacrifice of those on the firing line is to pledge their entire financial resources: Therefore be it

"'Resolved, That in behalf of this association of nearly five thousand St. Paul business and professional men we urge upon the Government conscription of dollars as well as of men, to be brought about through the imposition of large graduated income taxes, reaching the total absorption for all incomes over $100,000 a year.'

"H. B. R. BRIGGS,
"Editor St. Paul Daily News."

Mr. Chairman, when the wealthy men of this country are willing to sacrifice for the good of the country, when they are willing to sacrifice these mighty incomes, you will have no trouble in getting the boys without incomes to fight as volunteers for the flag. [Applause.] When you go with your conscript officer you will find the young man when he is drawn ready to go, because you will find the mind of the mother and father and the sentiment in that particular block in the city or in that community in the country is thoroughly imbued with the righteous motive and the righteous view of every Member of Congress and every member of the administration, and you will have no trouble in getting your soldiery. But you will have trouble in getting your soldiers unless you can convince them that this war means more freedom, more happiness, more peace, more quiet for the future; and I do not blame them.

When you call upon a man to die, he ought to be called upon to die for a great and an everlasting and an imperishable principle. I have made an effort within the last few weeks to make some investigation of the subject, and I believe I can successfully state, or can state without being successfully contradicted, that no hired army, no army educated and trained as such, has ever advanced the cause of human liberty on this earth. [Applause.] I believe I can also state that it has been the hired soldier that has trampled upon the liberties of mankind. It has been essential to the monarchical governments of the past that you have a great standing army to stand between the monarch and the people and to keep him on the throne. But when governments spring from the consent of the governed, when people shall be consulted at the ballot box and there is enough intelligence to enable the people to fairly register their will at the ballot box and to submit to the will of the majority, you do not need a soldiery. So during this war it ought not only to be our purpose in words, words, words, but in action, too, to say to the world that we do not intend to impoverish the masses, but that the wealth of this country shall contribute of its vast stores that which is necessary to preserve this institution, the Government of the United States, which means so much to them, more in property than it does to the poor and to the man that labors and toils.

Now, I am going to read to you a quotation from the Kansas City Star, and it strikes me that it has in it a principle which, if adopted by this Congress, will tend greatly to popularize our action in the future. I read:

We hold it to be incontrovertible that the Government which demands that men and women give their labor power, their bodies, and their lives to its service should demand also the service, in the interest of these human beings, of all wealth and the product of human toil—property. In the Civil War William R. Nelson used to say, "We took men's lives and paid them $13 a month in depreciated currency, while we were going hat in hand to the rich to borrow money to be repaid in gold." Such a policy is so grotesquely unfair that it would never be tolerated were not the people accustomed to it. By financing the war through borrowing money we put a double burden on the patriot man who does the fighting. We not only take away from him his business and risk his life but we saddle the payment of taxes on him when the war is over to pay the interest on the war debt, if he is so fortunate as to survive. Certainly, if every citizen is under the obligation to serve his country in time of war, the obligation must rest on income as well as on life. If we conscript a soldier, we ought to conscript income.

Then, why should the man who because of age or physical defect can not serve in the Army enjoy his income? A truly democratic policy demands that we conscript incomes as well as men, and we can not afford to make any sham at this conscription of incomes. It must be a real conscription. It must be a real sacrifice to satisfy the boy that is going to-day, and the mother and father that are going to give up the boy. [Applause.]

Oh, you may sit, if you please, in this place of safety and security; you may sit here and cold-bloodedly consider this question of financing this war, and you may be afraid to pursue that line which will call down upon your head the criticism of the public press; but there ought to be in every heart here a sense of duty higher than that of holding our seats in Congress, and the man who would cast a vote in this trying hour to hold his seat in this body which is contradicted by his conscience is unworthy of a seat here. Therefore in the consideration of these questions it should be a consideration that would make for this bill the least burden upon the masses and place the burden of carrying on this war on the shoulders of the people who have the enormous fortunes. My only complaint about this bill is that we are not willing to do as they do in New Zealand, where the income tax, even in peace times, on over $50,000 is 100 per cent.

In Australia they conscript in times of peace 50 per cent of all the incomes over $500,000 and 100 per cent of all incomes over $5,000,000.

Another thing, to my mind, is equally essential to winning this war. Do not keep the people of the United States in the dark as to what is going on. [Applause.] I am unalterably opposed to censoring the press. [Applause.] No man was ever created on this earth good enough and wise enough to censor your thoughts or the expression of your thoughts. [Applause.]

I am willing that the Army and the Navy shall prevent any information getting outside of the United States that might in any way aid the enemy. I am willing that we shall not permit treasonable utterances in the public press; but further than this I will not go with my vote under any circumstances, because I want the people within the United States thoroughly informed of what is going on in the United States and what this administration is doing in reference to the Army and Navy of the United States. [Applause.]

Now, let us see what the censor in Great Britain did. They established first a very rigid censor there. The censor remained for the time being and kept the English people in the dark; but ere long there were two real hardy newspaper editors, who took the chances of imprisonment and attacked the Government in reference to munition contracts. They laid bare the fraud; they laid bare the capacity of the private institutions who had the special privilege in reference to the contracts. The balance of the press took it up, and the result was that there was a revolution in the Cabinet of England, and the newspaper men that called attention of the people to the fraud saved the British Empire, if not the civilization of the world. [Applause..]

I have not myself been fairly treated, in my judgment, by the public press. I have been the victim of as much slander as any man, taking into consideration my obscurity in politics and the obscure position I hold. But I would rather these men in the gallery and that every newspaper in the United States had the absolute right to publish even falsehoods, as false as it is possible for type to make it, than to stop their right to publish that which is the truth and the whole truth.

I am not afraid, gentlemen, of the newspaper when it lies about me. I am afraid of it when it begins to tell the truth about me. [Laughter.] A lie never hurts a public man if he is right in his heart and right in his conscience. You can not hurt a man by falsely representing him, provided, as Jefferson says, "reason is left free to combat it."

After the English realized the mistake they had made, then the Admiralty, the old war dogs of the sea, who were so secretive that they did not want anybody to publish anything—these same war dogs, after they realized what the public press meant to them, organized a campaign of publicity for the British Navy, and it is conducted and carried on to-day.

The same thing practically occurred in France. Let me tell you, if you try to keep the American people in the dark, if you lead them to believe that there is some official somewhere censoring what shall go out from the press gallery to the newspapers in the United States, and that they are not getting the whole truth, you are going to create a great suspicion in the minds of the people which will be infinitely more harmful than all the truths and falsehoods the newspapers can tell. I do not believe the American people, who have been taught from the foundation of the Government to the present time that free speech and a free press shall always be inviolate, would be willing because of a foreign war that the public press should not publish the truth about all officials. If an official does wrong, he ought to be criticized, and if the criticism is harsh it will do no harm.

While an Army officer or a naval officer, like a Congressman, does not like harsh criticism, do you know that harsh criticism does both good, and when they deserve it it will do the Army officer and the naval officer good in the conduct of this war? Good criticism does us all good. If it were not for some criticism back home the votes in this House might be entirely different from time to time.

Ah, gentlemen of the committee, a man that wants to do right is never afraid of the light of day. The cablegrams can be censored going out of the United States, England, and France and the United States can control the information that shall get into Germany, but let us not muzzle the public press. I feel that if I were a friend of Germany and I wanted to arouse suspicion here I would put a muzzle on the public press. As one gentleman said, the devil may have invented a better means of accomplishing wrongdoing than to muzzle the press, but he has not yet done it. The devil has not been able to find anything that will do human freedom and human justice more harm than to muzzle the press.

What do you find that Thomas Jefferson did? In the first amendment to the Constitution he coupled up freedom of the press and speech with the freedom of conscience and religion, and when you shall lay hands on that instrument and shall take the freedom of the press out of it, the next step may be to take out the freedom of religion.

It is not in the piping times of peace that the Constitution is serviceable. It is not when everything is running smooth that we need any constitutional limitation. It is only in times of stress and storm, only in time of war, it is only when the political earthquake comes that we need the constitutional limitation—upheavals overturning public opinion, leaving men with their minds in an unbalanced state. Then it is that we ought to look to that Constitution, the palladium of our liberties, and not set aside the spirit of the first amendment to the Constitution—free speech and free religion. [Applause.]

There have always been two great ideals in government. The older one is that the power to govern and control the people shall be separate and apart from them, or, if you please, over and above them. That is the old idea of government. It was perhaps necessary when people were savages and when they were densely ignorant. It was perhaps necessary when they did not have free speech and a free press. It was perhaps necessary when they did not have schools and a free religion, to preserve the government which has been imposed upon them and to preserve the law that they had nothing to do with making.

There is another idea, the American idea, the modern idea, and that is that all just powers of government spring from the consent of the governed. There are two ideas of government now in the world. One is a modified form of ours, to wit, the German system of government and the German thought. Our system is still as far removed from the German system and German thought as it is possible for governments to be removed, both being civilized communities. When the Government of the United States, through its authorized agents, shall endeavor to determine what a man shall do with his life, then we are adopting to that extent the German or Bismarckian system of government. You adhere to the American system when you say that every man shall determine for himself what he shall do with his life. Shall I cultivate the soil? That shall be determined by me and by the necessities and environments that surround me. Shall I practice law? That shall be determined by the man himself. Shall I practice medicine? Whatever may be your distinct vocation, that you shall determine for yourself, and you shall use your talents in those lines as are best dictated by your own judgment and the environment in which you find yourself. Shall I be a soldier? Yes, if I desire to be a soldier and the Government furnishes me means of training, and we ought to do that. Then let the man be a soldier if he desires to be. But let me tell you what is an ideal far beyond that. The next step which civilization shall take can not be taken by any one nation alone. It must be taken by some sort of international agreement, and that international agreement must be backed up by international thought and international conscience. The people must be taught to think alike, and before we can ever be able to get rid of the armaments that we have been compelled to make, it is necessary that in this immediate thought there shall be full international agreement; and I hope that time has come, and I hope that the good that may be gotten out of this war will be that the people of all of the nations and all of the climes under free speech and a free press, all of the open-hearted, great-minded, great-souled men, shall rise up and proclaim to the world that while in the past we have been compelled to suffer the evils of mighty armies with their tread that shakes the earth, with the rattling sabers that have made streams and oceans of blood, because we were forced by our neighbors to do it. The object, the aim, and the purpose of this war on the part of every Republican and every Democrat, of every man in America, of every woman and every child, shall be such that we must and shall have an international agreement that will free the world forever from a repetition of what is occurring now; and let the occupant of the White House make his administration so fair, so just, and equitable that not only by utterance but by conduct of the administration he may convince the American people that that thought already is in their minds and hearts, and that that is what he is endeavoring to write upon the hearts and minds of the people of the world. And when that is done, there will be good, unlimited good, come out of this struggle. For in the future the billions now spent in slaying our fellow men can be used in building up the people of all the earth in peaceful pursuits and making for the happiness of mankind. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we have witnessed, I think, the most incongrous legislative proceeding in this bill that has ever been brought before this House. For four hours we listened to the argument of the learned and distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], attempting to explain the provisions of this bill. He characterized it as illogical, as oppressive, and as bad legislation, and the only thing that he could say to justify it was that we "needed the money," and that is his argument, and that is the argument that we would meet if we met a man in a back alley with a blind mask on his face and a revolver in his hand. He would tell us that he "needed the money." After he had concluded his argument upon the bill we listened to the distinguished Republican leader of the Committee on Ways and Means of this House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], for nearly four hours in his attempt to justify the bill, and he characterized it as the worst piece of legislation he had ever brought out of that committee, but he gagged and strained and finally said that he intended to vote for it and would support it. Then one by one the whole 21 members of that committee, almost, have come forward, and, with one exception, they have agreed to support the bill upon the ground that we were "at war" and that "we needed the money." I submit that that is no reason why we should pass legislation of this kind. I am opposed to this bill for two reasons, although there are many others that could be assigned. In the first place, the bill imposes a tax that is excessive and unnecessary upon our people at a time when they can ill afford to pay it. The other reason is that we ought not to raise all of the revenue necessary to pay so great a portion of war expenses as one-half by the imposition of taxes on the present generation. This bill, if passed—and I warn you gentlemen, because I come from a great industrial section of western Pennsylvania—will create consternation and havoc and terror among the industrial populations of the North and the South, the East and the West.

There is another matter that developed in the discussion of this bill that is most singular. When we declared war on Germany we did it pursuant to what we believed to be our duty, and we took our inspiration from the President of the United States speaking in this room to us when he warned us that Germany had made war upon our commerce, had murdered our citizens, had proscribed a zone within which our ships could not go, and he said in language that is now well nigh historic:

> There is one choice we can not make, we are incapable of making. We will not choose the path of submission and suffer the most sacred rights of our Nation and our people to be ignored or violated. The wrongs against which we now array ourselves are no common wrongs; they cut the very roots of human life.

Pursuant to that message, with it ringing in our ears, we passed a resolution in which we said that the repeated acts of war committed against our Government by Germany had thrust upon the people of the United States a condition that demanded the declaration of war. We hear now nothing about Germany wrecking our ships and murdering our citizens and assailing the sovereignty of our flag, but we are told that we are waging this war in the interest of humanity; that we propose to carry democracy to Europe; that we propose to drive the Hohenzollern family from the throne of Germany, while our soldiers shall fight side by side with the soldiers of King George and that his throne shall not be disturbed. We are told that we propose to reestablish the monarchy in Belgium, and at the same time we are giving money to overthrow autocracy and convert European peoples to an ideal. That we will drive from the throne of the dual monarchy of Austria-Hungary the house of Hapsburg, while loaning money to Italy, whose monarchy we will not disturb because it is aiding us. Gentlemen, I believe it has been stated here this morning, and repeatedly in this debate, that what we want to do is to popularize this war with the American people. I agree to that proposition, but I believe this war will never be indorsed, never will become popular, never will gain the heart and soul of the American people and their support if we leave them believe that we are going over to Europe to overturn established governments which were established by the people of Europe themselves. [Applause.] What we want to do, and what we want to bring more clearly to the attention of the American people, gentlemen, is the purpose that the President laid down for us as the basis upon which this war is to be waged. We are waging this war because the Imperial German Government has attacked our sovereignty on the high seas, has questioned our right of free commercial intercourse with nations with which we are at peace, and has assailed the immutable principles of international law and of right and justice; and we propose, as the President said, not to yield those principles that are right and unassailable. I do not know why this change should come about, unless some ingenious orator or writer or perhaps an inspired press has taken the cue from what Mr. Lincoln did during the War of the Rebellion. Slavery started that war, and when Mr. Lincoln came here on the 4th of March, 1861, to be inaugurated there was already organized and in session at Montgomery, Ala., the Congress of the Confederacy; seven Southern States were in open rebellion against the Government of the United States. But Mr. Lincoln was patient; he made no move until Sumter was assailed, until the flag was shot down, until territory of the United States had been seized, and then he issued his call for volunteers, not to free the slaves but for volunteers to preserve the Union. And from that time on we heard little in the North about freeing the slaves, but much about defending the Union, and the northern soldiers fought to save the Union from that time from dissolution.

When the Government of the United States established an embargo that was drawn around the South to strangle it to death and prevent the importation of supplies and the exportation of cotton to Europe, and when the spindles of Sheffield and Leeds and Manchester were standing idle and the employees were starving at the doors of the closed mills, and there was great danger that the British Government would acknowledge that the South was an independent nation and thereby grant to it the credit due from such act, then Mr. Lincoln sent Mr. Beecher to England to present the case of the Northern States. He instructed him to change the issue and to present to those disconsolate and dissatisfied working people of England this proposition: That if the North was overthrown, slavery would be enforced upon one branch of the English-speaking people, and the common people of England never would sanction that. They had recently abolished slavery from the British Empire. To their eternal credit be it said—for it is well known that the ruling classes of England had determined to recognize the independence of the South—that the common people of England, starving and enduring hardships, stood for the principle that human slavery should not be extended in the United States, and therefore the North was enabled to triumph, and the Union was saved. Now, my friends, it would be of little use indeed for me at this late time in this debate to undertake to criticize the schedules of this bill. Any man who now argues upon this bill finds himself in the position of the two colored boys down in the district of the distinguished chairman of this committee. One colored boy said to the other, "Jackson, if you had your wish of three things in this world, what would you take?" "Well," he said, "I would take watermelon, I would take chicken, and I would take possum. Now," he said, "Rastus, if you had your wish for three things, what would you take?" "Well, Jackson," said Rastus, "you left nothing for me to say." [Laughter.] And so that is about the position we find ourselves in when we come to argue these schedules after three full days' debate. I shall not take up these schedules in detail, as my time will not permit it, but I assail this bill because it is an attempt to extract by extortionate and oppressive taxation from the present generation, who are called upon to fight this war and to suffer and give their lives and blood, if we are to win it, an exorbitant sum of money. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. May I have a few more minutes just to complete my statement?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBBINS. It would be useless for me to stand here and assail this bill if I did not propose a remedy. I do propose a remedy. This bill raises more money, according to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], by $600,000,000 than is necessary. Of course, the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] immediately said that was not true, and both of these gentlemen are sincere; both of them can not be correct, and therefore this bill must be a guess at best. We ought to only undertake to pay one-fourth of the cost of this war by taxation during the war and three-fourths by issuing bonds. Let posterity, for whose benefit this war is being waged, help to pay the cost. England is raising 25 per cent from taxation and the balance from the sale of bonds, France 18 per cent by tax, and Germany 12 per cent, and the balance by the sale of bonds. Let us profit by their experience and follow the same course. This bill is unnecessarily extortionate.

I will tell you how, gentlemen, we can raise this money and not fill the bankrupt courts with litigation, not destroy our own industries, not wreck the corporations and destroy the press of the country, not go back and extract an income tax from last year's income, not bring about all these conditions at this time, when there are greater hardships and suffering among our people of small incomes and greater suffering for the want of actual necessities of life among our working people than there has been within 50 years. When within a generation has flour been $17 a barrel, lard 35 cents a pound, meat 60 cents and up per pound, sugar 11 cents per pound, and all the necessaries of life at the very high price that now prevails? And the purchasing power of money less than half what it was on the 1st day of July, 1914, when the European war opened. There are two objects from which we can raise this entire sum and not disturb any of the business conditions of this country. Let us levy it on the swollen incomes of individuals and corporations arising out of the war profits [applause] and let us make up the deficit by passing a reasonable and proper Republican protective tariff measure. These will provide all the revenue we need. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY].

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as a member of the Ways and Means Committee, which framed this $1,800,000,000 war-revenue measure, it was my intention to discuss some of the features of the bill at length. I find, however, that the public is justifiably impatient. The public is looking for action and is disinclined for words. I agree with the public, and therefore I am going to speak 1 minute instead of 30 minutes, and patriotically give back 29 minutes of my time. [Applause.]

I believe that the decks should be cleared for action, that we should get to work, and I am strongly of the hope that in the immediate future the committee charged with the consideration of the food bills will bring into this House for quick passage a bill giving to the President of the United States full power and authority to conserve the food supply of this Nation for the benefit of the public and the prosecution of this war. I believe that there should be a gallows erected for every food speculator.

I thank the committee, and yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] 15 minutes.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I shall occupy your attention but a short time.

The Ways and Means Committee a short time ago took up the question of preparing this bill to raise the revenue necessary to meet the expenditures of the Government in the present crisis.

It has been said on this floor that this bill is intended to raise by taxation larger sums of money than any bill ever presented to any legislative body in the world.

I want to discuss as briefly as I may the plan adopted by your committee for raising this revenue.

The distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. KITCHIN], in presenting this bill for the consideration of the House, said he proposed to shut his eyes and vote for the bill. The distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] voiced substantially the same sentiment.

As we all know, the cost of the necessaries of life at the present time has reached a point to which the family with a small income can hardly reach, and in the very near future in this country of bounteous plenty the question of sufficient bread may become one of the problems to be solved.

In framing a revenue bill to raise the great sums necessary in the present emergency every possible effort should be made not to increase the cost of the necessaries of life nor to disturb the business of the country. Already plans are being considered to prevent the cost of these necessaries going beyond the reach of the people, and it occurs to me in this bill, in so far as we are able, we should relieve families of moderate means from any further burdens than are already placed upon them. It therefore follows that so much as is possible of this revenue should be raised from the large incomes and excess profits of those who have profited by this great war.

This bill in some respects followed this plan, and in other respects it places the burdens upon those many of whom can illy afford to pay.

The bill provides a 3 per cent tax on amount paid for freight and 10 per cent on the amount paid for express. It provides a tax of 10 per cent on passenger traffic. It provides a tax of 5 per cent on gas, electric power, light, heat, and so forth, for domestic use. It provides a tax for telephone and telegraph communications. It provides a tax for advertising and advertising space. It provides a tax for insurance. From these sources it is proposed to raise the following sums:

Freight taxation	$77,500,000
Express	15,000,000
Passenger	75,000,000
Electric light, gas, domestic power, telephone service, etc.	30,000,000
Telegraph and telephone messages	7,000,000
Advertising	7,500,000
Insurance	5,000,000

The bill further provides for a stamp tax on nearly all papers, notes, transfers, and so forth, which is intended to raise many millions.

The bill proposes to increase first-class postage to 3 cents per ounce and post cards to 2 cents each. It is estimated this increase will raise $70,000,000 per annum.

The bill provides for an increase of second-class postage sufficient to raise an additional $19,000,000, estimated.

I am calling your attention specifically to this proposed tax, because in nearly all of the items mentioned nearly every dollar will be paid directly by the consumer.

I know, and we all know, that the American people are patriotic and will willingly pay whatever is necessary to be paid within their power in order that this war may be brought to a speedy close. But the people of this country expect this Congress to equitably distribute this burden among the people of the country. And that is the purpose of our examination of this bill to-day, namely, to place these burdens where they can best be carried, and where they ought to be carried.

I received a letter from a friend of mine which I desire to place in the RECORD and which demonstrates the patriotism of the people in being ready to pay whatever fair share of the taxes may be placed upon them. It is as follows:

JONES PIANO CO.,
Des Moines, Iowa, May 11, 1917.

Hon. CASSIUS DOWELL,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CASH: I am receiving letters from various manufacturers and musical organizations requesting that I wire you to protest against the war tax on musical merchandise. It may be refreshing to you in this trying time to know that I am in favor of this tax on musical merchandise even though it gets in on my business.

I am further in favor of an increased corporation tax and progressive increase of tax on incomes. All of these would get me. However, since there is no likelihood of their drafting me on account of my age, I am nevertheless more than a platform and street-corner patriot. I believe that we invited this war, we have profited by the war, and therefore we ought to pay the "fiddler." We now have the money. The next generation might not be so fortunate. I am in favor of conscripting money. In fact I do not believe our men should be conscripted until we have conscripted money in abundance.

Further, if we put the tax on heavy enough to pay as we go there will be no temptation on the part of the rich and powerful to prolong the war unnecessarily. After the Civil War my grandfather and my uncles not only did the fighting but they returned to ruined business, disrupted homes, and then were compelled to bear their burden of taxation in order to pay the expense of the war in which they had fought.

I believe we who are to be left at home in this case should pay all of these expenses and the men who do the fighting should be exempt from war tax. I realize that these are times when you hardly know which way to turn, but I am inclined to believe that you might receive direction and comfort from the God whom we all serve, the God of our fathers, and the God of your mother, and to whom we shall all pray for leadership and for you.

Your friend,

PAUL JONES.

[Applause.]

This letter I received on yesterday, and I have read it because I want you to know that the people at home are willing to go down in their pockets and pay whatever is necessary to pay within their ability to carry this war to a successful conclusion.

While I know the patriotism of our people and I know that they are willing to make whatever sacrifices are necessary in order to conclude this war, I want to briefly suggest to you the method which I believe should be employed to raise this revenue without placing such heavy burdens upon our people.

My position is that these burdens should be distributed in an equitable and fair way. They should not be placed in such a way as will disturb the business interests of our country nor rest too heavily upon the shoulders of those unable to pay.

The tax should be more heavily laid upon war profits and upon high incomes and excess profits. In other words, the great companies who are making these enormous profits out of this war should be compelled to contribute heavily toward the expenses of the war. And in this respect this bill should be amended.

As proof of what I have just stated I want to call your attention briefly to the enormous profits being received by these great companies. I read from the Wall Street Journal, October 11, 1916, page 1, as follows:

BETHLEHEM STEEL CORPORATION ESTIMATED EARNINGS.

Net earnings have averaged more than $5,000,000 per month since the first of the year. As a result, estimates of $60,000,000 for the full year of 1916 are regarded as conservative.

In 1914 the net profits of the Bethlehem Steel Co. is quoted at $5,590,020.

I read further from the Wall Street Journal dated December 22, 1916, page 7:

MIDVALE STEEL CO.

In November the net earnings are understood to have reached the $4,000,000 mark. This figure is after deducting depreciation and month's proportion of fixed charges.

The net profits of the Du Pont Powder Co. for 1916 is reported at $82,107,693, as against $4,831,793 in 1914.

If I am incorrect in any of the quotations, I desire to be corrected.

I am calling your attention to these facts, gentlemen, that you may know the enormous profits that are now being received by these munition plants attributable wholly to this war and because of large contracts on account of this war.

Why should these great companies not pay a large part of this excess profit for the maintenance of the Government during this crisis? This profit was obtained by them through the war and because of the war, and every dollar of it is attributable to the war and is a war profit.

I believe that when we take into consideration the enormous increase in these profits since 1914 we should require these companies to pay more than is provided in this bill instead of placing these burdens upon the necessaries of life.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DOWELL. I yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As I take it, the gentleman believes we should levy a larger tax upon these high profits; that they should pay a higher per cent than a low profit?

Mr. DOWELL. I certainly do.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In that connection, then, I understand the gentleman differs very much from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] who spoke yesterday, and who would levy a tax on any profits, no matter what they were, high or low.

Mr. DOWELL. I would levy these taxes upon the excess profits and the large incomes in order to carry on this war, rather than to go to those who can not afford to pay.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. I can not; I have only a few moments of time.

In this bill the excess-profits-tax rate is 8 per cent at the present time upon the net income after deducting $5,000 and an amount equivalent to 8 per cent of the actual capital invested. This bill proposes to levy an additional tax equivalent to 8 per cent of the net income of corporations and partnerships, determined in the same manner.

In view of the enormous profits received by these companies, this tax is insufficient, unfair, and inadequate, and I propose that it be greatly increased in this bill and burdens elsewhere correspondingly reduced.

Now, I want to call your attention to the profits of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, and I quote briefly again from the Wall Street Journal, September 9, 1916, page 5:

THE STANDARD OIL CO. OF INDIANA.

Melon believed near. On especially good buying stock of company advanced to $725 per share September 8, a record high price, and a gain of $100 per share this week. The inference from the strength of the stock is that the time is not far off when the company will distribute to stockholders a larger share of its earnings and perhaps a part of its large surplus. Surplus on December 31 last was close to $27,000,000, and it is certain it is much above that figure now.

On September 11, 1916, the Wall Street Journal gives the following:

Secretary Stohl says: "Talk of stock distribution is wholly anticipatory at present. If we knew how much longer extraordinary conditions due to the war are going to last it would be a simpler matter to make our plans." The company's balance surplus is unofficially estimated well above 115 per cent on the stock. Estimates of the melon now ripening run as high as 100 per cent stock dividends.

I am advised that there are 30 or more of these Standard companies throughout the United States, fixing their own prices without let or hindrance.

According to the statement I have just read, this stock is now worth $725 per share. And, as I understand it, under this bill the excess-profit tax has been increased 8 per cent only.

I want to place this tax where I believe it belongs, and I earnestly hope that in the consideration of this bill it will be so changed that these large fortunes with these great incomes and excess profits brought to these concerns by reason of this terrible war will be made to pay their share of the expenses of this war.

In a few months the young men of our country will be taken from their homes and from the salaries they are receiving—maybe $1,000, $2,000, or $3,000 per year. They will be enlisted in the Army of our country and may be sent to the trenches in France. They will be deprived and their families will be deprived of the salaries these young men have been receiving. In addition to surrendering all of their income and accepting the pay of $25 per month they may be called upon to give up their lives for their country.

Why should we not take from the men who are making the enormous profits out of this war a large part of the sums they are receiving when these young men who are in the service are sacrificing their salaries and their lives for this great Republic? [Applause.] All of the patriotism should not be required of those who are not able to enjoy the large profits of these great munitions factories. I believe that if the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] will assist to amend this bill and place greater burdens of taxation upon these great fortunes and enormous profits he can then vote for the bill without shutting his eyes, and he can afterwards look every man squarely in the face, saying, "I made every man perform his duty." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think it was Gen. Sherman who said, "War is hell." Whether the general had in mind, at the time he made that famous declaration, war taxes I do not know, but that declaration applies equally to taxes as it does to the other misfortunes of war as is evidenced by the unanimity with which constituents of some gentlemen oppose first one, then another, and, finally, all of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has said that he would shut his eyes and vote for the bill. I shall go him one better. I shall vote for certain amendments in the hope that they will be adopted; but whether they are adopted or not adopted, I shall deem it my duty to vote for the bill, and I shall vote for it with my eyes wide open, realizing what an awful burden it places upon the American people, but believing that the burden of this war should be borne to a considerable extent by this generation and that we must pass such a measure as shall eventually be agreed upon.

On the other hand, if I had been a member of the Committee on Ways and Means and had been allowed to have my way I would not have laid all of the taxes or placed some of them as high as the committee has. I am convinced that there are some features of the bill that are not equitable, and I hope that those features will be carefully discussed and remedied, for even burdens should be equitable burdens, and we can all vote for this bill with a nearer approach to cheerfulness, at least with more resignation, if certain inequitable provisions have been eliminated and certain provisions have been modified.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman believe that we should collect the amount of money that is proposed to be collected in this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. If I had the entire responsibility of doing it, I think I would not place upon the American people at this time so heavy a burden as the bill proposes to place on them. I shall vote for the bill, not because it exactly meets my views, but because it seems to be the product of the best judgment of the committee and will, I hope, when it passes the House, be the product of the best judgment of the House.

But we are placing this burden pretty heavily upon the present generation, and on the people who must not only bear the direct burdens of taxations but the indirect burdens which high prices place on all, particularly those of moderate means.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have not the time now to discuss all the various features of the measure which I hope to see modified. I hope to do that later. I want to discuss in the brief time I have one feature of the bill which, while it has been considerably discussed, has not been discussed at all, so far as I have listened to the debate, from the standpoint from which I desire to approach it. I refer to the provision of the bill which proposes to establish a zone system for second-class mail matter.

I think it may be possible that we are not charging the publishers of newspapers and magazines as much as we should of the cost to the people of the transportation of papers and magazines, and I should be perfectly willing to vote for a provision which proposed some reasonable increase on a flat rate on the newspaper and magazine postage of the country. But I am opposed to the method under which the committee seeks to establish in this country zones of information [applause]—zones of literature, zones for the promulgation of views and ideas. It was the historian Froude who made the statement that a homogeneous and vigorous people may conduct their own affairs under a liberal constitution as long as their personal characters remain undegenerate. The converse of that is—and that was the thought in the mind of the historian—that a non-homogeneous people can not successfully conduct government under a free constitution, and that is true, as evidenced by all the lessons of history. If we have any one problem in this country that we must constantly have in mind and constantly contend against it is that of the tendency of people to become provincial, narrow, sectional in view and thought. And so I approach this question not from the standpoint of the newspapers and their interests, important as they are; not from the standpoint of revenue, important as that is; but from the standpoint of the interests of the American people, from the standpoint of its effect upon the continuation and perpetuation of free institutions.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] said the other day in the debate, "If you establish this zone system, the magazines will start plants out in your country and they will go to issuing magazines there." Well, if that were to be the effect of it, that would not cure the situation. I am no more in favor of a Wyoming and Nebraska provincialism than I am of a Maine or a Boston or a Louisiana provincialism.

It is true that some of these papers which enjoy the second-rate privilege do not furnish the people with a very high class of literature. There is a lot of soft and sickly sentimentalism in some of it, as evidenced by the extracts read by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]; there is a goodly lot of touch and go and sensational melodrama, but the weepy sentimentalism and the Sixteen-String-Jack melodrama not only appeals now but always will appeal to certain people, and if we are to have it I want it to be national weepy melodrama; I want it to be national blood and thunder literature rather than the weepy melodrama of Kokomo disseminated in a little circle around Kokomo, and Sheboygan blood-and-thunder sensationalism disseminated in and around Sheboygan and near-by country precincts and localities.

This is not primarily a question of revenue. The sum to be obtained by treating news and literature and the dissemination of information and intelligence as though it were beans and butter sent through the parcel post is relatively pitiably small, but the principle involved is a matter of vastly more importance than that of revenue, of vastly more importance than the interest of the people who publish the newspapers and magazines.

I have a neighbor who since I can remember has taken the New Orleans Picayune. I have a neighbor who takes the San Francisco papers. I have always tried to have New York and Chicago papers in my home. We receive from these papers the point of view of these sections of the country distant from us, and we need that point of view. We must have that point of view if we continue to be a homogeneous people, having the same thoughts, the same aspirations, the same hopes, and the same viewpoint of government and of the blessings of liberty. [Applause.]

It is not a question of a few dollars of revenue, it is not a question of whether or no it is fair or unfair to the newspapers and magazines, it is a question whether it is fair to the American people. [Applause.] I know that the newspapers and magazines are not always fair, they are not always reasonable, they do not always tell the exact truth. There is not one of us who at one time or another has not felt very resentful toward certain newspapers, toward certain magazines, but if they are to make mistakes, if they are to exaggerate, if they are sometimes to be unfair, let it be a national exaggeration and a national unfairness and not provincial and limited and local.

I should not feel any differently in regard to this matter if most magazines in this country, instead of being published at Augusta, Me., or New York or Boston or elsewhere, were published in my State or in my section of the Union. I would, in that case, feel, as I do now, that any system of postal rates calculated to circumscribe them to the locality in which they are published was regrettable and unfortunate. Consider for a moment the situation you would create. Possibly some of us may take the publications that are published in Augusta, Me., to which the gentleman from Illinois referred. I do not happen to subscribe to them myself, but we do take magazines like the Outlook, the Independent, the North American Review, the Atlantic Review, the Century, the Youth's Companion, the Ladies' Home Journal, and they are not going to be transplanted to our western country, as suggested by the gentleman from Connecticut. If they were, it would not help the case any, from my viewpoint, if they could not circulate freely throughout the country. The Nation is large, and the population is great, and its people are intelligent, and they buy magazines and newspapers in great numbers; and right or wrong, it is these great magazines and these great newspapers that are the molders and leaders of the public thought. Wherever they are published it ought to be as easy and as cheap for the citizen to buy them in one part of the Nation as in another. [Applause.] I appeal in this matter not from the standpoint of those who publish these papers and magazines, not from the viewpoint of those who make money out of them, though that viewpoint should be considered, but from the viewpoint of the hopes and aspirations of the American people, from the viewpoint of our hope that we may maintain here what has never been maintained heretofore anywhere else on earth for any considerable time, a great population scattered over a vast territory homogeneous in its views, in its habit of thought, and in its aspirations. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is making a very interesting speech, and I want to ask whether he is advocating that there shall be no increase whatever in the second-class mail rates or that there shall be no zone system?

Mr. MONDELL. I am particularly opposed to the zone system. I am not sure but that we might properly increase, even double the rate as a flat rate over the country. But I would want to study that before I advocated it; but if it is equitable, if it is just to make any increase, make it a flat rate. I am not appealing to you because I live in Wyoming or because under your bill we would have to pay there 50, 60 cents, or $1 more per year for certain newspapers and magazines—I might be able to afford to do it and might be willing to do it, but the majority of the people could not afford it, and that would create a condition under which we would each and all of us soon be living in a miserable little zone of local information, local thought, and local ideas.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. The basis of the gentleman's objection is not so much against the increase in the revenue of second-class mail matter as against the zone system.

Mr. MONDELL. My argument is primarily against the zone system.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more. I want to ask the gentleman a question. I want to say to the gentleman that first-class mail pays now 2 cents an ounce, or a fractional part thereof, and therefore pays a minimum of 32 cents a pound. It undoubtedly runs up as high as 50 cents a pound for first-class mail matter. Second-class mail matter pays 1 cent a pound. There is an annual loss on mail matter so that the Government must go down into its pocket and pay the loss to the Post Office Department. In the gentleman's opinion, where does that loss come from, the first-class mail matter or the second-class mail matter, and if the 1 cent a pound on second-class mail matter is responsible for the loss, what in the gentleman's opinion is the duty of Congress in removing the injustice?

Mr. MONDELL. I thank the gentleman for that question, and inasmuch as it is quite long, would the gentleman be good enough to yield me five minutes instead of two in which to answer it? [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, the question whether or not the second-class mail matter is paying a proper proportion of the cost to the people for carrying it through the mails is a very important question and one that belongs primarily not to the gentleman's committee, but to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. That is a very able committee. I am willing to follow it on anything which after due and careful deliberation they agree upon, other than the zone system.

I am willing to follow the gentleman's committee if they are fully informed on such a flat increase in postal rates as they think under war conditions is fair and equitable and reasonable. I want, however, to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the policy of carrying second-class mail matter at less than it costs is one long established among English-speaking people—not only ourselves but all the English-speaking people the world over—and we probably never shall reach a condition where properly classified second-class mail matter will be compelled to bear the whole burden of its distribution. It is possible that we have not legislated wisely in differentiating between the various classes of publications now entitled to the second-class mail privilege. My own opinion is that there are certain classes of trade journals now enjoying that privilege which should not enjoy the privilege because they in nowise are journals for the general dissemination of ideas and opinions or news, but that they are in effect commercial advertisers. There may be others which for various reasons are not entitled to the second-class rate. Those are matters of detail to be worked out. What I am particularly objecting to is this idea of treating news and ideas and literature as though they were beans and bacon sent through the parcel post, having no more effect upon the moral and spiritual life of the Nation than those very excellent and necessary products.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman gets beans and bacon and enlightenment through advertising out in Wyoming, does the gentleman want me to pay for it? You get it and I do not. Do you want me to pay for it? Is that the idea?

Mr. MONDELL. Not beans and bacon.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is what the gentleman said.

Mr. MONDELL. But enlightenment, because we are so broad-minded in Wyoming——

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, dear!

Mr. MONDELL. That we are willing to get ideas even from Michigan. Some gentlemen do not seem to want to get any ideas from beyond their own provincial boundaries. I get a lot of good ideas, and I get some stuff that I do not agree with—but that sets me to thinking—out of the New Orleans Picayune, which my neighbor takes and which he is good enough to hand to me frequently. It is not a question of asking you to pay for our information, for our enlightenment, but it is the question of all of the people paying for the dissemination of information and enlightenment the country over. That is the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Wyoming, for I want to have this letter read as a question to him, that he may answer it, and if he can not answer it in two minutes I will yield him four. I send the letter to the Clerk's desk and ask to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, May 14, 1917.

Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Please accept our congratulations on the tax bill reported by the Ways and Means Committee. This bill should go through as it stands. Opponents to it are demanding special privileges and are acting from purely selfish motives, and with no consideration for the general public. We hope that you will succeed in killing all demands for special privilege regardless of source.

HENRY ALTEMUS CO.

Mr. FORDNEY. Can the gentleman answer that in two minutes? If not, I will yield him four minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Who is Henry Altemus?

Mr. FORDNEY. The letter says that they are a publishing company.

Mr. MONDELL. I can answer that in two minutes. If Henry Altemus, publisher, is in favor of this provision, then by the same token I should be inclined to the opinion it does not affect him at all or if at all then favorably. It probably unfortunately and disastrously affects some of his competitors, and he may be for it because he thinks it is in his personal interest. But I am not discussing the matter from the standpoint of the publisher. I should be as much opposed to it if every publisher were willing to accept it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman know that the statement he is making about the Altemus Co. is correct?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know anything much about them.

Mr. FORDNEY. Of course he does not, and he ought not to say that.

Mr. MONDELL. But you handed me this pig in a poke.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I did not. I opened the poke for you. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. And I had to answer it from general inference of those things which control human action with which we are all more or less familiar. We are not asking for special privilege. It is no special privilege to insist on having this country remain a homogeneous land, to insist on the free and uninterrupted flow of ideas throughout the country.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. With the same habits of thought, with the same ideals, the same aspirations, the same hopes; and the only way to accomplish that is to so provide the dissemination of ideas that the humblest citizen anywhere, even in the remote sections of the Nation, can secure information as readily and cheaply as any other citizen anywhere in the land. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman from Wyoming allow me to read a paragraph from a letter from the presiding judge of the Springfield common pleas court?

Mr. MONDELL. If I have the time.

Mr. FESS. He says in this letter:

This afternoon I appointed a receiver of a heretofore prosperous publishing house, who based their petition for receivership largely upon the threatened increase of the postal rates, which will practically exhaust any profits they have heretofore made.

That is a letter from Judge Geiger, of the common pleas court of Springfield, Ohio, a man who has no interest whatever in publishing houses.

Mr. MONDELL. Let me make this further suggestion to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORDNEY. Is the gentleman answering the gentleman from Ohio or me?

Mr. MONDELL. It is a general observation I hope that both will consider.

Mr. FORDNEY. Before the gentleman answers that I desire him to answer me, and I will yield him sufficient time. Here is a concern going into bankruptcy, according to the extract which the gentleman from Ohio has just read, before the law even has passed this House. How wonderful is the effect that this increase in postage is going to have on the concerns now bankrupt!

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman give me two minutes in which to answer that?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. May I suggest, so that he can answer both of us, that if it is bankrupt now before the law goes into effect, is it not likely that it has been bankrupt for some time?

Mr. FORDNEY. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman give me two minutes to answer that?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and I want the gentleman to answer it and to tell me all about this concern that is now bankrupt.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Michigan asked a question a moment ago which he thought was in reply, by its suggestiveness, to the gentleman's idea and protest against the zone system. The gentleman from Michigan asked the gentleman from Wyoming this question in substance: The gentleman from Wyoming wants to get the benefit in Wyoming, but wants Michigan to pay for it. How is it with the tax on lumber which goes to Michigan, the gentleman himself being a big lumber man?

Mr. FORDNEY. I would inform the gentleman from Wisconsin that there is no duty on lumber. I will inform him another thing, that there is no lumber which goes from the east to Wyoming, and the gentleman ought to know that. If the gentleman knew what he was talking about he would know that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does not this bill put on a 10 per cent tax——

Mr. FORDNEY. This bill will permit it, but it has not gone into effect and it has not hurt anybody yet—has not put that company into bankruptcy.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman can not get away with that statement. Does not this bill put a 10 per cent tariff upon lumber?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; if it goes into effect.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understand it, but the statement the gentleman made would convey an entirely different proposition.

Mr. FORDNEY. No.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is intended to put a 10 per cent tariff upon lumber, and it is now on the free list.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield additional time to the gentleman from Wyoming, but I want to answer the gentleman from Wisconsin. I have stated to the gentleman from Wisconsin that under existing law there is no duty on rough lumber, and the gentleman ought to know it. He voted either for or against the law. Another thing, there is not any lumber that goes from east of the Mississippi to the State of Wyoming, and never did. The lumber going to Wyoming comes from British Columbia and the Northwest in the United States. If this bill goes into effect a higher rate of duty will be put upon lumber than existed under the Dingley tariff law. That is a suggestion I made to my Democratic friends when they put on the 10 per cent duty on all imports.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, may I have five minutes additional?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; but I will give the gentleman two minutes more. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Wyoming stands for a protective tariff, though it has but one industry affected by a tariff; but it stands for it on the theory of the highest good to the country generally. I had hoped that what I had said would not be brought down to a provincial basis as to how it shall affect Wyoming, or Oregon, or Maine, or California. We object to it just as much because it would tend to make the price of the Sunset Magazine, printed in San Francisco, prohibitive to us as because it makes the price of magazines, like the Outlook, printed in New York, prohibitive to us, and I would protest against it, I believe I would, as vigorously if I lived in Michigan or in New York or in Philadelphia or in Louisiana as I do coming from Wyoming, because it contains a menace, a menace to the future of this Nation and its people. I believe if the day ever comes when we shall treat the dissemination of news, of literature, and information as we treat the shipment of eggs, butter, and milk, we shall have started on the creation of a condition of affairs in this country tending to a provincialism that with the passing of the years will be exceedingly harmful.

Now, as to the case of the firm referred to in the communications presented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. It would not be at all strange if a publishing firm finding it difficult to meet the constantly increasing costs of material and labor should have been forced into bankruptcy by the threat of this added burden. It might well be the last straw that broke the back of this burdened enterprise. We should give consideration to the interests of the publishers, but I still adhere to my own especial text that even more important is the interest of the people in the wide and unrestricted circulation of newspapers and magazines. It so happens that in this case the interests of the people and of the publishers are along the same lines.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman know of anything transported by freight or by mail at a loss except second-class mail matter? If so, name it.

Mr. MONDELL. It is awful hard——

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, yes; it certainly is.

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). To answer the questions of a gentleman who lacks the imagination to differentiate between hams and lumber and newspapers and magazines. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING]. [Applause.]

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that some gentlemen are seeking to avoid their responsibility by finding fault with the Committee on Ways and Means. Some gentlemen who have discussed this bill to-day have either misrepresented or misunderstood the attitude of the members of the committee. No one should think that if he had framed this bill it would have been perfect in the opinion of all other Members. No one but himself would have thought so. I am quite sure that every member of the committee who has spoken on the bill has said to the House frankly that in some particulars, and in some cases in many particulars, the bill did not suit them. I am no exception to that rule. If I had written the bill, it would have been different. If any other member of the Committee on Ways and Means had written the bill, it would have been different from what it is and different from what every other member of the committee would have made it. That would be true if the Ways and Means Committee of the House were made up of 23 other members instead of the 23 members who happen now to serve on that committee. I know that is true, because you gentlemen who have stood here and criticized the bill and who have found fault with the Ways and Means Committee for reporting this bill to the House there are no two of you who are agreed in your criticisms of the bill. We might just as well understand now that when this bill goes out of the House it will probably not satisfy a single Member of the House of Representatives in all particulars. And when it comes back here from the Senate it will not satisfy a single Member of this House. But the responsibility was placed upon the members of the Committee on Ways and Means to report a bill to the House which would raise $1,800,000,000. They were for three weeks engaged in that arduous task. They discussed the proposition on every side from every viewpoint, and when we had completed the bill I believed, and I think that every member of that committee believed, that it was the best possible bill that the committee could agree on.

When it goes out of this House it may be changed. There may be some amendments, but it does not follow, because any one of you succeed in getting an amendment, that it will improve the bill in any great degree. It will satisfy you better perhaps, but it will dissatisfy others more. You are only shifting the burden from those whom you represent to those whom somebody else represents. Gentlemen have selected certain parts of the bill, certain schedules and sections, and found fault with them. They would take them out of the bill, but we are bound to produce $1,800,000,000, so if you would take it out of one place you must put it somewhere else. You will simply shift the burden from one class of people or from one class of business to another class of people or another class of business.

Some Members will try to justify their opposition to this bill on the ground that it produces more revenue than the Government needs. My colleague from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] on yesterday discussed that question at great length. He said we did not need as much revenue as this bill produced by more than $600,000,000. Now, I say to you, gentlemen, that you can not justify opposition to this bill on that ground. We will need every dollar of revenue that this bill will raise and much more. Already, when the Committee on Appropriations brought into this House its appropriation bill appropriating $2,700,000,000 at this session, even then they did not appropriate for the estimates made by the departments by the amount of $760,000,000. The department asked at that time that the House appropriate for war purposes $760,000,000 more than was appropriated by that bill. At that time, which I think was nearly a month ago, the Secretary of the Treasury sent to the House estimates amounting to $3,460,340,000.

A month ago the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy called upon the Secretary of the Treasury for that amount of money to be expended during the remainder of this fiscal year and the fiscal year ending June, 1918. Nobody, no experts in the department, no set of men anywhere can foresee a year ahead the needs of the Government in this crisis. Beginning with the very opening day of this Congress the departments began to send their estimates to the House of Representatives for their needs during that time, and from that time up until the 23d day of April they continued to add day after day to their estimates as things developed in their departments, where they saw money would be needed. And when that bill came in the estimates from the departments then was $3,460,000,000. Then we provided revenue to the amount of $2,000,000,000 by the way of an issue of bonds, and the departments suggested that we raise almost as much money by a direct tax. The idea of the administration was that we should produce by tax as much money as we produced by bonds, on the idea that we should pay one half the cost of the war and the future should pay the other half. If the war is of short duration it will make but little difference how we allot the cost. Either the present or the future can pay it or any part of it without being overburdened. If the war continues and develops as it may, it will not be for us to apportion the costs. We will be compelled by conditions to collect by tax all we can and charge every dollar to the future that our credit will permit. The allied countries have now reached that point. So let us not differ about immaterial things. We hope under this bill to raise almost $2,000,000,000 every year. But the bond issue is but for a single year—that is, the revenue we produce from bonds this year we can not produce from the same bonds another year. And so even though it is fifty-fifty now, next year, if this war develops, as we fear it may, as it probably will, we will need a very much greater amount of revenue than the Government is asking for at this time. And then there will be new bond issues of perhaps $2,000,000,000 more, and other revenue bills until it will not be a question of how much revenue by each method, but how much can we raise by all methods.

Gentlemen have said that England was only raising 25 per cent of her revenue by taxation, France 15 per cent, and Germany 13 per cent. It is not a matter of policy with those nations that they raise so small an amount by taxation each year. It is because they have reached the very limit of their power to tax at all. It is because they can not produce more than 15 or 20 per cent of their revenue by taxation, and they are compelled to raise revenue by the larger issue of bonds, and that will be true in our case if the war goes on and the country becomes deeply involved in it, as we fear it will.

But let us see what the estimates are up to the present time. When the Committee on Appropriations reported the estimates were $3,460,000,000. That does not include $245,000,000 interest on these bonds and Treasury certificates which we authorized to be issued under the bond-issue bill. The interest of $245,000,000 is not included in these estimates. Other estimates amounting to $108,130,000 have been sent to the House since the appropriation bill was reported, making a total of $3,568,471,000 which the departments are asking for and which we must raise if we do our duty in supplying revenue to carry on the war. Add to these estimates $245,000,000 which will be needed to pay the interest on the bonds and we have a total of $3,813,471,000 which we know now must be raised. We have provided for $2,000,000,000 of this by a bond issue and $1,800,000,000 by this bill, a total of $3,800,000,000, which is $13,471,000 less than the amount which we know to a certainty is needed. We know more than that. We have started on a course of shipbuilding. It is proposed to expend $500,000,000 in that way before June 30, 1918. This is covered in no estimate which has come to us, but we know it will be spent as well as though it had been asked for, and that added to the $13,471,000 makes a total of deficits in the revenue of $513,471,000.

So instead of the statement made by my colleague on yesterday, that we were raising $600,000,000 more than the needs of the Government required, we are raising $513,471,000 less than the needs of the Government for the next fiscal year. And that is not all, gentlemen. Every day new things arise in the department in this emergency which the men there can not foresee. They are seeing the need for more money as days go by and as the weeks go by. They can not foretell all the emergencies that will arise in creating and maintaining this great army of 2,000,000 men and this great Navy of 150,000 men, and these estimates will go on increasing until when we meet next winter we will find facing us a much greater deficit in the revenues of the Government than $513,471,000.

I sincerely wish that those gentlemen who are opposing this bill on the ground that it produces too much revenue were right. My prejudices are with them. I listened with the utmost attention to learn, if I could, where we were taxing the people unnecessarily. I would have been glad to have reduced the amount of this bill if they had shown me that the money was not needed. Indeed, I would be glad if we did not have to raise one single dollar by new legislation, but I hoped in vain. They did not show that our revenue measures were unnecessarily high, and no Member of this House need flatter himself that he can justify opposition to the bill on the ground that it is unnecessary. The amount is too small. We had as well realize it now, and get ready to do our full duty in devising ways and means to carry on this war. I have given you only the plain facts, the unerring mathematical conclusions, that are as unpleasant to me as they are to you. Unless peace is attained before the next session of Congress we will have to increase the revenues by $531,471,000 at that time. This I know. The facts are already before us; but I confidently believe that this necessity will be increased to more than a billion by the first Monday in next December.

Now, gentlemen, I want to say a word about one or two features of the bill that have been criticized by some of the Members that were not on the committee. Three or four gentlemen have stood on this floor and condemned in unmeasured terms the excess profits tax. An equal number have stood in the same place and in unmeasured terms commended it as the best feature in this revenue bill. When you gentlemen who were not on the committee are so frank in your views and so pronounced in your opinions and differ so radically, do you wonder that there were some differences and some difficulties in the Committee on Ways and Means in agreeing on a bill of any kind?

Now, an excess-profits tax is not my kind of a tax. I would not resort to it in normal times, but under the circumstances, in my opinion, the committee was absolutely justified in doubling the excess profits tax. Why, let us see just how harsh it is to the men and the corporations that are making immense profits in this country. In the first place, they are allowed to take out of their profits $5,000, and that is a very important item to a corporation that has invested only $100,000. That is a very important item to a corporation that has invested even $200,000, because it means their first exemption is an exemption of 2½ per cent on the capital invested. And, then, in addition to that, they take out 8 per cent, giving to the corporations of $200,000 an exemption, in the first instance, of 10½ per cent.

Now, I think in these times men ought to be satisfied with those profits. It seems to me that that is enough under the circumstances, and that men ought to be willing when the country is in the throes of war, and when the Treasury Department is needing vast sums of money to carry it to a successful issue, to cause men to be satisfied with 10½ cents on every dollar that they have got invested. But that is not all he gets out of it. He gets in addition to this 8 per cent, and in addition to this $5,000 exemption, 84 per cent of all the rest of the profits that he makes. And so these corporations that are making big profits, these concerns that have grown wealthy in times of peace, in times of prosperity, ought not to complain of the excess profits tax.

A great deal has been said about the increased tax on second-class mail matter. My colleague from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] on yesterday criticized the committee for not imposing a tax on advertising matter instead of increasing the mail rate. He was so unkind as to say that we had failed to impose an advertising tax because it was a burden to newspapers and magazines which tell our constituents whether our conduct here had been good or bad. He said in effect that we were afraid to put a tax on newspaper and magazine advertising. And yet in the same breath he charges the committee with having imposed a tax, an increased burden, on this same kind of publications, which is very much more offensive than would be an advertising tax. Well, whether it would be or not I do not know, but I doubt very much whether my friend from Illinois would vote for an advertising tax that would create revenue worth speaking of. But the committee did have the courage to add $19,000,000 to the revenues of the Government for carrying second-class mail matter. My colleague from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has been on a committee for the last 12 years, a strong influential man on that committee, where he might have imposed that tax on second-class mail matter if he had seen fit to do so. But I will not insinuate that the reason he did not do it was because he was afraid of the instrumentalities that told the people whether our conduct was either good or bad.

Now, let me say to you, gentlemen, I believe in all you have said about a subsidy to literature, a subsidy to the diffusion of knowledge, a subsidy to spread information throughout the country. I think no one opposes that. But what we say is this, that the men who manufacture advertising ought to pay the cost of transportation and the cost to the Government of handling their products, just the same as every other industry pays its own cost.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. May I have a few minutes more?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Would five minutes be sufficient?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I think so. If it is not I shall ask for more.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to ask the gentleman how much more it costs the Government to carry this second-class mail matter than the Government receives in payment for it?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I think the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads a year ago, or maybe two years ago, made an investigation of that subject and found that the Government was paying about $88,000,000 in addition to the amount that it got for carrying second-class mail matter.

Mr. THOMAS. This bill, then, requires them to pay $19,000,000 of that $88,000,000?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes. That is all the increase that is made in this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, do you know of any good reason why the newspapers and magazines of the country should be exempted from paying postage, and why should they not pay this $88,000,000 in postage?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to tell the House what I think about this proposition on second-class mail matter. This is one of the provisions of the bill which I thought might well have been different, but the majority of the committee thought that this method was the best, and when the majority said that we ought to adopt this, I voted to report the bill to the House, although it did not agree in all particulars with my idea as to the postage on second-class mail matter. I would not object to information and literature and knowledge being diffused throughout the country at a loss to the Government.

I am perfectly willing to allow all the reading matter contained in the newspapers and magazines to go here and there and everywhere on a flat rate of 1 cent a pound, even though the Government should lose some money on that. But I believe it is one of the very serious sins of omission of the Congress of the United States that it has not required the manufacturers of advertising matter to pay the cost of handling and carrying their products everywhere and wherever they sought to send them. Why subsidize this particular business? Advertising is a distinct business and a profitable one, and we have no right to tax other business to the extent of $88,000,000 per year to carry and distribute the products of the advertiser. We ought to so fix the rate, even by the zone system or some other system, so that every man who sends out advertising to the people pays for it himself and not the Government. He recoups himself by adding the cost to the price of the product, as he should do, and the ultimate consumer pays it, just as the proprietor of every other factory and every other producer pays the freight on his products and adds it to the cost.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Would it not be a fair proposition to send the reading matter of newspapers and periodicals at a flat 1-cent rate and then charge the parcel-post rate for that portion of the publication devoted to advertising?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. That is my idea exactly. I have no doubt that a plan of that kind could be arranged by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; and if it would do that, and if the Congress of the United States would adopt something of that kind, we would remove forever from the discussions in this House that ever-recurring question of postage rates and put it behind us for all future years. A postal rate based on that plan could not be justly criticized by anybody. I submit that the provision in this bill is only one step toward making the producers of advertising matter pay a part of the expenses of the Government in carrying their products throughout the country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. On the advertising question I take it from what the gentleman says that he would prefer that we should go to the point where we have to tax advertising, having the advertising so taxed that it would be paid by the advertiser and not by the newspapers.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I have no doubt any tax we would put upon newspapers and magazines for advertisements would be shifted to the man who has paid for the advertising.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Advertising is commerce, of course. It is a business. It is not an individual matter, but a business.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Purely a business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the newspaper takes the advertising from the merchant or the great department store desiring to do business with the public, so that if a newspaper was so forewarned, it could so adjust its rates as that the tax could be paid by the business man who was in the advertising business from the profit point of view?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Certainly. The newspaper and the magazine would not pay it at all. The man who paid for the advertisement would pay it, and after he paid it he would collect it from you and me by the increased price of his wares. There is no use talking about it, gentlemen, all these burdens of taxation are paid by the people. There is no escaping that.

Now, gentlemen, we ought not to be stampeded by these letters and telegrams we are getting from all parts of the country. We should not ignore them, but on the contrary give them thoughtful consideration. If they show any reason for amending this bill, we ought to amend it. But these many appeals to put the tax on some one else ought not to influence us. They all realize the tax must come. They do not dispute that. It is but the manifestation of human nature that many people want the other fellow to pay the tax.

I have one letter, however, in to-day's mail which I want to read. It comes to me like a "balm of Gilead." I got it among a great number of protests and faultfindings. I do not know the man that wrote it and never heard of him before, but God bless him, his letter is worthy of being perpetuated by being printed in the RECORD. It is signed by "Henry Altemus Co.," a publishing house in Philadelphia. I am of the opinion, too, that it is a house of some importance. This is what he says:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., May 15, 1917.

HON. JOHN A. STERLING,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Please accept our congratulations on the tax bill reported by the Ways and Means Committee. This bill should go through as it stands. Opponents to it are demanding special privileges and are acting from purely selfish motives and with no consideration for the general public. We hope that you will succeed in killing all demands for special privilege regardless of source.

HENRY ALTEMUS CO.

But gentlemen must not misunderstand me. I would not have the newspapers nor the magazines cease to carry advertisements. That is, and I presume will continue to be, their great source of profit, but it is a very easy matter to segregate the reading portion of any publication from the advertising portion. The reading portion is what carries the news to the people and diffuses new ideas, and if it is the right kind of literature it is educational in its influence. It is on that theory that the Government many years ago fixed a rate of 1 cent per pound for this kind of mail matter. Since then the business of advertising has grown immensely. It has multiplied prodigiously. It has become one of the most important kinds of business enterprise and commands business talent to carry it on, and in the main it has been profitable. Advertisements are purely a product created by this business enterprise, and the Government has no right to handle it at a loss any more than it has the right to pay the freight on a shipment of any other product and charge it up to the people. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] made an eloquent speech for the newspapers and the magazines. I sympathize with everything he said, and I agree with him that the Government can well afford to carry the literary and educational features of publications at a loss, but I draw the line at advertisements. The gentleman's constituents in Wyoming ought to pay the freight on advertisements from Boston and New York which they consume the same as the people in Boston and New York pay the freight on mutton and wool which they get from Wyoming. If Congress could reach the just and righteous consummation of treating all kinds of business on the same unbiased basis, we would forever end this controversy about mail rates on advertising matter.

There is only one item of taxation in this bill that will not be shifted from the man who pays it to the consumer, and that is the inheritance tax. When the man is dead his estate has got to pay the tax into the Treasury of the United States, and he being dead he can not shift it onto the ultimate consumer.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Has the gentleman any figures as to how many newspapers would be profitable if there were no advertising features in them at all?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I doubt if there would be any newspapers that would pay their way if they eliminated advertising. Considering the manner in which the public has been educated with reference to subscription prices, I doubt if there would be any newspapers that would pay their way under the present subscription prices that newspapers generally charge.

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. HELVERING. They base their subscriptions on a lower rate in order to enlarge their circulation and thereby obtain the advertisements on which they make their profit?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESS. I would take it that the gentleman would not join the class of those who say that the newspaper should be eliminated if it can not be run at a profit.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. The newspaper will not be eliminated. I would say this, that an industry that will not pay its way is an industry that the people do not want. That is very plain. If the people want it they will support it. They want and will have newspapers in abundance. But why is it that the Government should undertake by a subsidy first to create and then to maintain industries, such as the advertising industry, and tax other industries to pay the subsidy? Let us distinguish between literature and advertisements. If there are any publications in this country that could not, after we subsidize their literary features, pay their way they ought to stop publication, and the country would be no worse off for it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, when Congress voted for war I was one of the Representatives who so voted, because I believed that war with Germany was inevitable, either now or after the war between the entente powers and the central powers should be finished. We had offended Germany in so many ways since the great war broke out that her Government and people had a deep feeling of resentment. At the conclusion of the great war, when our country, as the only great Nation that had reaped a financial profit from the bloody struggle, and when, for that reason, we would have incurred the dislike, scorn, and contempt of all other nations, Germany would, in my opinion, have called the United States to account for its assumed offenses and with a mighty army and navy it would have exacted from us a tribute of billions, sufficient to recoup her vast expenditures. This consideration, which I believe was the overpowering one that influenced the President and the administration, is the one which most strongly appealed to me when I voted for the war declaration. I believed it far better to accept Germany's challenge at once and have war now, when we would have friends among other nations, and strong allies, rather than to wait one, two, or three years, and then, still unprepared, as we surely would have been, make battle alone and unaided with a resistless, relentless, and merciless foe. I sincerely believe that our national existence as a free and independent people was involved in the decision, and, deeply as I regret that we should have to go to war at all, I firmly believe that we have entered the struggle at exactly the right time and in a holy cause—that of national integrity and existence.

If President Wilson and his advisers reasoned the subject out in this fashion, as I am fully persuaded they did, it was a statesmanlike conclusion, followed by courageous action, to advise Congress to declare war.

I am, therefore, ascribing high and wise motives to the administration, which I unqualifiedly indorse, and I have given and will give it my hearty support in all essential legislation, without thought of partisan or personal considerations.

Having thus defined my position of loyalty to the administration and to the vigorous conduct of the war, I most emphatically wish to dissent from the idea that has more than once been expressed on this floor, directly and indirectly, that such loyalty and purpose require a blind and unquestioning acquiescence upon the part of the Members of Congress in the details of measures presented for consideration, even those that are recommended as emergency war legislation. Especially is this true as to measures vitally affecting the liberties of the people and the freedom of speech and of the press, like the so-called espionage bill or one affecting the business and daily occupations of the people so intimately that it may mean their very existence, like the bill under consideration—the war-revenue bill.

The Members of this House come directly from the people. It is their duty, under the Constitution, to consider well all legislation in time of war, as well as in time of peace, as the direct representatives of the people, and the opinions, and even the necessities, of any other department of the Government do not relieve the Congress from this grave duty and responsibility.

In considering this revenue bill as it is presented to the House by the Committee on Ways and Means, I am impressed with two considerations:

First, that the bill calls for the raising of too great a sum of money at one time.

Second, that in raising this vast sum the load is not in all cases evenly and equitably distributed.

This bill provides for two distinct methods of levying the money to meet the requirement of eighteen hundred millions. The first of these is the levy on incomes and excess profits. This levy is the easiest to raise and will produce the least disturbance in business conditions. In fact, it is somewhat remarkable that comparatively few complaints have been made as to the tremendous and, in this country, unprecedented levies proposed by these features. In my personal experience I have not received a single protest from any person on account of the proposed levies on incomes and excess profits. It will affect business only in the way of curtailing those people who receive large profits from investing that particular money in new enterprises or in enlarging those already existing.

The second and most difficult feature of the bill is that which taxes business and enterprise of nearly every kind. That all lines of business should participate in this war tax is beyond controversy. But the extent of that participation should be governed by high considerations of justice and careful attention to the probable effects of the levy and the manner in which it is made. I maintain that in many instances the application of the tax is made in a way that will tend to the serious discouragement, if not the destruction, of certain lines of business. I can not agree with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that a tax should be levied upon any line of business without some better reason than that "the Government needs the money." That reasoning would preclude any consideration of the moral rights of citizens to preserve and enjoy the enterprises to which they may have devoted their entire lives. The old fable of "killing the goose that laid the golden egg" is one which might well and profitably be considered by the Members of this House in acting upon this bill.

In contemplating the problem of raising this $1,800,000,000 and that of the vast tax-paying public which will be called upon to meet this vast levy, in addition to the fifteen hundred millions that will be collected this year in the ordinary way for the usual expenses of Government, my mind has reverted to a homely comparison in the remarkable similarity, in respect to burden bearing, of the taxpaying public of the United States, with the mule pack trains which some of you have seen in the mountains of the West and in Mexico. I have had intimate association with mule pack trains; have ridden muleback hundreds, even thousands of miles in the mountains of California, Nevada, Arizona, and Mexico, and have often marveled at the lack of appreciation of that wonderful and useful animal. Not to-day, Mr. Chairman, but some day when you and the House have more time and less important business, I should like to deliver a proper tribute and eulogy to that wonderful product of Missouri and Kentucky—the patient, powerful, faithful, undaunted, and dependable mule—the pioneer of civilization. [Applause.] At the present time, however, I shall confine myself to a eulogy of his counterpart in burden bearing—the taxpaying public. As I have stated, there are many characteristics in common between the two, as you will observe, when I point out some of the characteristics of the pack mule.

At a mine in northern California with which I was connected for several years we were compelled to pack all freight from the end of the wagon road about 16 miles through the canyons and up the mountains to the mine. All machinery had to be made in sections in order that it might be thus conveyed. We had a splendid pack mule train of about 25 animals, of varying capacity, and capable of carrying from 2 to 3 tons of freight on a trip, properly distributed. It was, however, a matter of the greatest importance that the packing of the animals should be done properly. It was necessary that the load should be so arranged that it would not gall the mules and make sores on their backs, and thus diminish their power of transportation, as well as try their none too equable tempers. Well packed, a good mule will carry 250 or 300 pounds, and some unusually powerful animals will even carry 400 pounds. The pack train in motion is not unlike a small government. At its head is what is known as the bell mare, usually a white animal with a bell about her neck and bestrode by a lad who is known as the bell boy. The mules will follow this leader, distinguished by its color and by the tinkle of the bell, hour after hour. While the bell mare never by any chance shows any sentimental regard for her protégés, the mules invariably extend her the greatest deference and consideration, and even affection. The bell mare may be likened to the president of a country, who is to be faithfully followed, and the individual animals of the troop train to the Members of Congress. Then there is the "head packer" of the train—a man of action, who thoroughly understands the character and disposition of every member of his band—usually a man of stentorian voice, gifted in excoriation, and artistic in profanity, who, with the painful and efficient whip known as the "quirt," and with his coat pockets filled with rocks, which from time to time he throws dexterously at the laggards and those who stray from the trail, with abundant adjurations as to the uselessness of the delinquent animals. He may for the purpose of illustration in the character of his duties be likened to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. In this way the heavy-laden pack train proceeds on its way through the canyon and over the zigzag trails of the mountains, finally safely landing its precious load at its destination, the mine, which could be gotten there in no other way.

It is one of the established facts of geology, well recognized by the hardy prospector of the Sierras, the Rockies, and of picturesque Mexico, that God hides His treasures of gold and silver in the remote and inaccessible mountains, where mules and hardy saddle horses are the only possible means of transport. It must be added that He often places some very poor mines in these difficult situations.

It is a characteristic of the pack mule that he will not pack a pound more than he believes that physically he is able to do. He will make no protest at a pack below or up to the limit, but a pound more literally he will not "stand for." I have seen them lie down on the trail in patient but determined protest. When a pack mule takes that supreme step, neither scoldings, nor persuasive or violent profanity, nor kicks, nor stones applied by the skillful head packer will induce him to rise. He will wait until his pack is taken off and lightened. With the lighter load he will cheerfully resume the trail as though nothing had happened. It is thus with the taxpayer.

In the particular mule train to which I refer each of the animals enjoyed a distinctive name. One was "Bessie"; another, "General Grant"; still another, "Maggie"; but the most powerful and useful mule of all was known as "The Preacher." These names were given because of some individual quality in the animal or whim of the foreman. "The Preacher" was probably so called because of a stentorian voice which it was his pleasure to exercise with great frequency. He was capable of packing an ordinary load of 400 pounds and was usually chosen for the most difficult packs. There is a great difference between the ordinary pack and what is known as a top pack; that is, a pack like an ore car, or a piece of machinery, that can not be divided and placed on each side of the animal but must be carried on a special arrangement of saddle and necessarily high in the air. The maintaining of equilibrium is important in a pack of that sort. "The Preacher" was chosen to transport a heavy ore car to the mine, and necessarily this stood very high above his back, giving the load an appearance of nearly twice the ordinary height of a mule and with a very considerable weight. In carrying this pack and going up the trail along the side of a mountain chain, at the bottom of which ran a swift mountain stream, "The Preacher," as is the manner of mules, stepped aside from the trail for a little change; it being on the side of the mountain, however, the tendency was for the high-packed car to become top-heavy and tip to one side, and thus disturb the center of gravity. Do what he could, "The Preacher" was unable to reach the level trail again and after a desperate struggle toppled over and was borne down by the heavy top load and rolled swiftly to the bottom of the rocky canyon, 500 feet below, sometimes the poor mule on top and sometimes the car, until finally he lay bleeding, with limbs broken, by the side of the stream. The head packer was compelled to give him the mercy shot to save him from useless suffering, and the car remained at the side of the stream for a considerable time.

The moral of this is that the human prototype of "The Preacher"—the taxpayer of the country—not only should be skillfully loaded and the load well balanced and secured with the celebrated "diamond hitch"—the final triumph of the packing art—which will not permit of shifting of the load, but that he shall not be overloaded. Otherwise he may lie down on the trail or come to a fate no less distressing and tragic than that of the faithful "Preacher" whose story I have told.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OSBORNE. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. When the mule fails will we have to turn it over to the elephant? [Laughter.]

Mr. OSBORNE. With a great deal of pleasure. [Applause.]

A rather large proportion of the membership of Congress is composed of professional men, and a correspondingly small proportion of business men. More than half of my life I have been engaged in business pursuits of moderate dimensions, similar to those in which, perhaps, nine-tenths of the business men of the United States are engaged. Business of this kind is the lifeblood of the Nation; it is usually conducted with limited capital and on a narrow margin of profit; its success depends largely on the vigilance, activity, and intelligence of those who conduct it; it requires about as much brains to run a small business as it does to run a large one. One condition of its success, and of the success of all business, is that of stability of conditions upon which calculations are based. Suddenly increased costs are always distressing and often fatal to success. Those of you who have been in business will recall the anxieties which have doubtless been experienced by you more than once when some unexpected condition arose, with obligations coming due at a stated time. You may have had troubled days and sleepless nights.

You will also recall with what satisfaction you experienced some easement in the situation, in the way of extension of time on the obligation or by a loan or of some other character which enabled you to pass the crisis and spread the obligation over a greater period, thus enabling you to avoid financial ruin.

These observations have special reference to those provisions in the war-revenue bill which call for the immediate payment of 5 per cent on stocks in the hand of retailers. This provision would be especially onerous to all retail dealers and disastrous to those carrying goods of an expensive character. In this category a marked instance would be that of retail jewelers carrying stocks of from $50,000 to $500,000 in value. Many such are conducting business on a capital far less than that of the stocks in hand and are in debt for very considerable portions of their stock. The tax of 5 per cent upon the stock in hand would probably amount to 25 per cent of their actual capital. The immediate levy of so large an amount upon business at a time when other lines of business were making demands upon the banks for loans would be very likely to lead to disastrous results. I am sure that the Committee on Ways and Means does not intend to bring ruin upon a business or any class of business. The levying of 5 per cent upon sales by wholesalers can take care of itself, as the additional 5 per cent can be added to the price and collected when the sale is made. If the same principle of paying was applied to the retail dealers by way of monthly reports of sales, as is required of the wholesalers and manufacturers, the onerous character of the tax would be very greatly modified. The objection that such course with regard to retailers would result in more difficulty in collecting the tax is not one that is very appealing. The inconvenience of tax collectors is a small matter compared with the life and safety of an honest business built up by honest practices and years of faithful industry.

The statement that the "Government needs the money" is not a moral or statesmanlike reason for abrupt and unnecessarily harsh methods of collecting taxes.

The same reasoning will apply to retroactive taxes where business has been conducted on one basis and taxes are collected arbitrarily upon an entirely different basis than that existing when the business was transacted. The fact that the "Government needs the money" is again no excuse for immoral and illegal exactions.

The arrangement with regard to second-class mail rates is unwise and unjust, in my opinion. That second-class mail rates should be increased I fully concede. But the fact that former Congresses failed to do their duty in this regard is no reason why this Congress, composed in some degree at least of men who had nothing whatever to do with the alleged shortcomings of their predecessors, should proceed to punish newspaper and magazine publishers for availing themselves of the laws that existed. [Applause.] There can be no question that the wide dissemination of intelligence is desirable. That, of course, does not justify charging to the Government the cost of circulating purely advertising matter. I believe that such matter should pay what it costs the Government to circulate it. I object to the zone system, because it tends to denationalize our governmental system. In present conditions we are a remarkably united people. There is no material difference as to the appearance of men and women or the subjects which they discuss or the national aims they have in view between the residents of Boston and New Orleans, of New York and Cincinnati, of Chicago and Charleston, or of any of these cities with Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland, Seattle, Phoenix, Ariz., or Salt Lake City, Utah. One who has traveled much about the country for the past 30 years will have been impressed with the remarkable nationalization which has been going on in all parts of our common country. This is an encouraging and desirable condition. How far the zone system might tend to hurtfully modify that condition, I am not prepared to say.

If, however, we adopt the zone system, I can see no reason why publishers may not rightfully transport their product by some other means than the mails to a zone where they may have circulation and pay the local rates of the zone within which they may use the mails. I seriously doubt whether a denial of that right would stand the test of law, except possibly as a war measure, and I am doubtful about that. There is no moral reason, and there should be no legal reason, why publishers should be discriminated against and not permitted to use the ordinary methods of transportation, either freight or express, before they turn over their publications to the United States mails.

The assumption that they be compelled to pay the high rate fixed by this bill as a sort of penalty for their past indulgence in the privileges accorded them by Congress or because "the Government needs the money" does not impress me as either moral or sensible.

Mr. Chairman, these are a few of the imperfections that occur to me as being obvious in the present bill. I shall present some amendments to different sections of the bill at the proper time. I sincerely hope that the House of Representatives will find some way to amend this bill so that it will accomplish the purpose intended—that of raising the necessary amount of eighteen hundred millions of dollars without violating any rules of statesmanship, which are intended to conserve, protect, and maintain the principles of even-handed justice and the welfare of all classes of our people. We should not leave it to a coordinate branch of Congress to mend the mistakes of the rough draft of the bill which has been presented to us but we should do it ourselves, so far as our ability and sense of justice will permit, before it leaves this House.

It is my own judgment, Mr. Chairman, that this bill should be cut in two in the middle. We should provide for the entire eighteen hundred millions. But one-half of the amount, or $900,000,000, should be raised by the issue of indebtedness certificates, or bonds, running over a considerable period of time, thus lessening the dangers of general bankruptcy, precisely as a business man would do if confronted with the obligation of raising a larger amount of money than he could possibly raise without materially interfering with the effectiveness of his business relations and reducing his ability to pay taxes in the future. The other $900,000,000 I would raise by readjusting the schedules of this bill, rearranging the load in the skillful manner that I have described as characteristic of the head packer of the pack train—so that the burden may be distributed in a statesmanlike way; may not unduly and unnecessarily gall and cripple the strong, patient, and honest bearer of the burden, and may not drive any line of honest and legitimate business or any individual into bankruptcy. [Applause.] It is not disloyal to make provision against such dire contingencies.

I am not impressed with the wisdom of the shibboleth which we hear so frequently reported as coming from high official sources, that "this generation should pay the entire expenses of the war." The existence of nations are not divided into generations. A new generation is born every day and a generation dies every day. A nation's life is continuous and partakes of the character of immortality. Ours commenced one hundred and forty-odd years ago, and it is destined to live a thousand years to come. We are now in a great exigency of that national life. It is for us and others who for the time being are as stewards entrusted with authority and with the life and interest of the Nation, to take such steps as are necessary to preserve that life, and to make this Nation one of liberty, of high civilization, and of long endurance. Those who live now must fight the battles of their country. They must undergo unusual hardships. But it is no injustice to borrow upon the future everything that may be necessary to the perpetuity of our Nation and to the security and happiness of our children, and of our children's children, in all the generations to come. It is our duty to exercise that power and to fulfill that responsibility in wisdom, in courage, in justice, and with a high regard for national statesmanship for today and for evermore. [Applause.]

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, every succeeding speech during the progress of this debate convinces me more surely that this revenue measure is of supreme importance in so far as its effects upon the morale of the American people is concerned. If America is to come out of this conflict in which she is engaged with a more complete national consciousness, with the unity of a great people fully established by equal justice to all, then the methods adopted for raising revenue will be largely responsible.

It is equally true that if America falls victim to the disunion wrought by injustice and unequal burdens, the revenue methods will be responsible in great measure for such unhappy results.

The United States is sailing through the biggest storm it has ever attempted to weather. Whether the port reached finally will be better or worse than the one we left will depend upon the way in which the ship of state is guided during the storm.

This war is on the part of America a struggle for maintaining in the world that system of government whose leading object is to elevate the condition of common manhood, to afford all a fair chance in the race of life. It is to establish the principle that all just governments must be one for the people and by the people, its principal object being to advance the greatest good of the greatest number.

Now, the Imperial German Government maintains that such objects can be best attained by an autocracy and autocratic discipline. It maintains that its own benevolent despotism has assured justice to the common people, which can not be secured by democracy and its wasteful, shiftless, haphazard methods.

Here is the clear-cut dividing line. Every true lover of liberty believes that America's contention is right and that justice can best be secured by democracy. But the mere statement proves nothing. The great words we have uttered in entering this war must have great deeds in order to make them effective.

We can in this revenue measure perform an act and adopt a method which will prove that a democracy can secure the support of its wealth in time of need as well as its men. We can in the very method of raising the stupendous sum of $1,800,000,000 provided in this bill prove that this Government can protect and conserve the interests and welfare of the common man in America in time of war as well as in time of peace.

Mr. Chairman, we must see to it that taxation is not levied in such a way as to bring actual want and suffering to one man while it leaves another untouched. Rich men must not profit from this war while the poor bear its burdens. I believe that justice demands the conscription of incomes and excess profits during this war. [Applause.]

God knows the average family in America is being heavily enough taxed to-day without added burdens in this legislation. The food pirates and price manipulators have not hesitated in that direction. Speculators and gamblers have juggled chalk marks on blackboards in grain pits and stock exchanges, and thus levied toll of every dining table in the land.

Let me show you the extent of the tribute levied upon the people of America. I have here an official list issued by the Old Dutch Market of this city showing a comparison of retail food prices during April, 1914, and April, 1917.

In that three-year period sugar has jumped from 4 cents a pound to 9 cents, an increase of 125 per cent.

Flour increased from $7.25 a barrel to $14 a barrel, or 93 per cent.

Corn meal from 2½ cents to 5 cents a pound, or 100 per cent.
Navy beans from 7½ cents to 18 cents a pound, or 140 per cent.
Lima beans from 7 cents to 20 cents a pound, or 185 per cent.
Lard from 12½ cents to 25 cents a pound, or 100 per cent.
Butter from 30 cents to 55 cents a pound, or 83 per cent.
Eggs from 21 cents to 38 cents a dozen, or 80 per cent.
Potatoes from 23 cents to 90 cents a peck, or 291 per cent.
Onions from 4 cents to 13 cents a pound, or 250 per cent.
Cabbage from 3 cents to 15 cents a pound, or 400 per cent.

Here are 11 articles of common daily use, and they show an advance of 167 per cent in the past three years. The entire list of 60 articles of food shows astounding increases, with an average of 85 per cent for all. When you realize that even in 1914 the mounting prices of food supplies had become an acute question, you can understand the tragedy contained in these figures for the average family in America.

Mr. Chairman, a great part of these increases are due to gamblers in foodstuffs and manipulators of produce, whose greed and lust for gold have led them to striking dastardly blows at the very heart of America. For my part I consider them traitors to the Government and would like to see them lined up in front of a firing squad to meet the penalty due to such treason. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I presume the gentleman saw the circular that was sent around this morning to the effect that the price of food sent to Europe was only 50 per cent of what it is in the United States.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That fact only adds to the dangers and fans the flames of discontent. It makes still more criminal the conspiracies of those who are bleeding the people white on unjust prices of foodstuffs in America.

Mr. Chairman, I am contending that the common people of America have been paying taxes levied by criminal jugglers of food prices. Dealing with these conspirators is one of the most important duties growing out of this war. But even after their treasonable machinations are ended, the fact remains that the average man will bear his full share of the burdens of this war. He always has in the past, and this war will be no exception.

Federal reports show that nine-tenths of the wage earners of this country receive less than $1,000 a year. It requires at least that amount to provide decent living conditions for the average family to-day. Less than that sum means underfeeding, or insanitation, or physical decadence. It means a toll levied upon life and health which this Nation can not afford. Maj. Gen. Wm. Gorgas, whose reputation as a scientist is world-wide, says:

> The preventable mortality in this country is greater than the mortality of war. Science knows that the chief cause of disease is poverty; that disease can never be eliminated as long as people are forced to live poorly and close together.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I contend that the great mass of the American people have not in reality shared in the prosperity of the country during the war period. Wage increases have been insignificant in comparison with the rise in prices in every necessity of life. In turning the money he has made into food, fuel, rent, clothing, and so forth, the average man has found that it would not go as far as in times when his earnings were much smaller.

Under such circumstances justice in taxation means that it shall have the same effect upon the conditions of life of the people who pay it. I demand that taxes shall be laid upon the possessors of vast incomes and the receivers of excess profits to a point where they feel the sting of sacrifice, before they are levied upon the man whose every dollar is needed to maintain a decent standard of existence for himself and family.

It is just to conscript these incomes. The Nation does not borrow men for war; it takes them. Surely money is not to be regarded as more valuable than manhood, property more sacred than persons. Lincoln expressed the truth when he said:

We are for both the man and the dollar, but if we must choose between them we put the man above the dollar.

We have already drafted the manhood for military service on the basic idea of obligation to serve. We should not hesitate for one moment to draft the incomes of the country on the same principle. Upon what we do in this important matter may depend whether we win or lose the democracy for which we went to war. It is possible in taxation bills in Congress to administer as dangerous a blow to democracy as can be given on the battle field by our enemy.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen have spoken as though the proposal to put the brunt of war taxation upon the receivers of great incomes and immense profits is an unheard of proposition, sure to result in disaster. England proves how baseless such a statement really is. During the 12 months ending March 31 the revenue of the British Government from taxation was nearly $2,600,000,000. The New Republic is authority for the statement that this additional taxation has not affected the business of the country unfavorably and has not proved a damper on business enterprise. On the contrary, the evident justice of taxing heavily those whose incomes have risen since the beginning of the war has stimulated the people generally to whole-hearted activity in every economic field.

The income tax in England has been increased to meet the needs and the excess-profits tax has been created for the same purpose. In the year 1913–14 the income tax yielded $236,245,000. In 1914–15 it increased to $346,995,000. In 1915–16 it produced $641,600,000, and in the present fiscal year, 1916–17, it will yield the stupendous sum of $1,025,165,000.

The excess-profits tax during the present year will bring into the treasury the sum of $699,600,000.

The total revenues from these two sources—income tax and excess profits—in England this year will be $1,724,765,000, or practically the same amount as is carried in this bill now under consideration.

Nor must it be forgotten that this sum is raised on a total income estimated to be $15,000,000,000, while American income is estimated to be three times as great, or $45,000,000,000. That means that if we should raise the entire amount of this bill by income and excess profits taxes alone it would still be but one-third of the burden as levied by England. If we should go as far as Great Britain in these two forms of taxation, we could raise the sum of $5,174,295,000.

In spite of all the specious arguments of those who oppose for selfish reasons the imposition of taxes which will conscript the peaks of vast incomes and profits, this Congress should rewrite the sections of this bill dealing with these subjects. As the bill is now drawn, all incomes up to $500,000 will pay a graduated tax, but after that amount there will be a flat rate. In other words, a considerable number of men will receive special advantages in this bill by enjoying immunity from increased taxation above that limit. There should be, even under the theory of the bill itself, a progressive increase until some point is reached above which the entire income will be taken by the Government. I believe the figure should be fixed at $100,000, which would work absolutely no hardship in the real meaning of the word. It might mean a curtailment of the number of automobiles or pleasure yachts or summer cottages, perhaps, but it would not approach the sacrifice involved in the payment of even a few dollars by those whose incomes can scarcely be made to cover the cost of the actual necessities of life.

It is not confiscation of property, for it would be levied only on the incomes accruing during the war. It would not even be a levy on lands or factories or industries, but it would absorb only a portion of the current incomes from such sources. With the close of the war the tax could be reduced to meet the demands of peace.

For the possessors of great incomes to fight the conscription of their increment above a reasonable figure is shortsighted policy. They should be eager to prove to the people that they are willing to assume their full share of the burdens of this war. If they do not take that attitude now, the day will come when they will regret it with unavailing bitterness. The great mass of the people will endure without protest all sacrifices which are justly theirs to assume in consequence of this war, but they will not quietly endure the injustice of being required to furnish most of the men necessary and pay most of the expense as well.

Some men who belong to the class of the very wealthy have accepted the situation like patriotic Americans. I was glad to see in a market letter recently sent out by a brokerage firm in New York the following statement:

We accept the general principle that wealth as well as persons should be conscripted and that those who risk their lives to fight our battles should not return home to pay for years to come the cost of conducting the war.

In my district there live as many millionaires as in almost any district represented in this House. I believe they are patriotic and loyal to America and will gladly assume their full share of the burden of taxation now made necessary. But if they will not willingly perform their duty, I will vote here to compel them to do it. I recognize no distinction in the obligation resting upon every citizen to serve to his utmost, between the poorest, humblest citizen in America and the man with multiplied millions. I realize, too, that no amount of money can compare in point of sacrifice with that of the man who gives himself, life and all, to his country. [Applause.]

Scan the reports of the great industrial corporations for the last few years and you will see clearly into whose pockets the Nation's prosperity has gone.

I select at random a few corporations from the official reports showing their net profits, after deducting cost of materials, labor, depreciation, interest, and all other charges.

Here is the American Can Co.: It cleared, in 1914, the sum of $2,916,339. In 1916 it had net profits of $7,962,982.

Armour & Co.: In 1914 it had net profits of $7,506,908, and in 1916 its net profits were $20,100,000.

Bethlehem Steel: In 1914 it cleared $5,590,020, and in 1916 its profits had jumped to $43,593,368.

Du Pont Powder Co.: In 1914 it cleared $4,831,793, and in 1916 that figure had been increased to $82,107,693.

Swift & Co.: In 1914 it made clear profits of $9,450,000 and in 1916, $420,465,000.

United States Steel: In 1914 its profits were $23,496,678, and in 1916 it had cleared the sum of $271,531,730.

These are just a few, and the entire list tells the same story in unvarying uniformity. Of 24 companies in this list it is true that their increased profits for 1916 over 1914 is 500 per cent. The excess profits of American corporations for this year over 1914 will mount into the billions.

Does any man contend that these tremendous gains in profits should not be shared with the Government in time of war? I maintain that simple justice demands that a large portion of the profits due to war conditions, as shown in these figures I have just quoted, be turned into the National Treasury to meet the financial needs of the Government in this hour of stress and storm.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is a hodgepodge, haphazard measure in which seemingly all principles of taxations have been sacrificed in order to secure a unanimous report from the Ways and Means Committee.

I need not call attention to the inequalities contained in its provisions, its burdens upon many lines of business. If any one of them is worse than another, it is the additional tax levied upon alcoholic liquors. Such a tax simply links the Government in closer partnership with the liquor business than ever, at the very time when the great American citizenship is rising up in its might to demand that the partnership be forever dissolved. It is inconceivable that we shall go through this war with the liquor traffic levying its toll of destruction upon foodstuffs and man power. Then, why should we give new arguments to those who seek to perpetuate a traffic that is doomed in war time by the law of self-defense? The revenues lost through the abolition of the liquor traffic can be easily made up by increased income and excess-profits taxes, and as it must be done sooner or later why not start right in this first war-taxation measure.

In any case, Russia has proven the wisdom of eliminating the liquor traffic from a purely economic standpoint. The increased production of labor, the marvelous growth of savings deposits among the people have proven that act one of enlightened statesmanship worth almost any sacrifice in itself to secure. It proves that Gladstone was right years ago when he responded to a delegation of London brewers who had come to ask him to levy new taxes on their products to meet governmental needs. He said:

Gentlemen, you need give yourselves no trouble about the revenue. The question of revenue must never stand in the way of needed reforms. But give me a sober population, not wasting their earnings in strong drink, and I shall know where to get the revenue.

Again, if this bill proposes to equalize postal rates it should carry a provision that mail-order house catalogues should pay third-class rates. The Post Office Department is losing millions of dollars a year and private concerns are granted princely subsidies by the classification of these catalogues as parcel post under the zone system. It is a harmful injustice to every local dealer in America, for it gives undue privileges to a few great mail-order houses. If Congress is determined to use every possible variety of taxation in this bill, here is an item that is worthy of consideration, and it would mean increased revenues of from eight or ten million dollars.

Mr. Chairman, upon the American Congress and Executive rests the responsibility of making democracy secure here and now. Bringing it to pass will not mean destruction but development, not undoing by unfoldment, not revolution but evolution, not unlearning but learning more, not retracing our steps but going forward.

By the sacred call to war for democracy we are bound to be true. That call, so nobly answered, must usher in the day of the man called Million. Its program is based on the welfare of the common man, the man of the mill and shop and store and farm. Its purpose rests on his worth; its hope depends upon his strength.

I believe in the power of democracy once it becomes a living truth in the hearts of men. Rich men, thriving from industrial tragedies, may become as unselfish as those other rich men on the doomed Titanic and Lusitania, who went calmly to their watery graves so that the immigrant women and children might be saved.

If their selfishness is real, it is not so controlling that it can not be dissipated by an appeal stirring enough to make them realize their responsibilities for the common good of America.

It is not only their duty now to bear these tax burdens to the full extent of their ability; it should be their privilege as well. The man who does not recognize the obligation to devoted service now is himself the loser. I care not how wealthy he may be, a man can not be truly satisfied with himself unless he shares the burdens of his country. I defy any man to coldly and selfishly plan for his own personal profit without considering right and wrong and the voice of patriotism. He may spend all his energies selfishly and build his fortune higher and higher; his neglect of justice and the interests of his fellow countrymen make his life and health and possessions less secure. He simply executes sentence of punishment upon himself.

Let no man say that the plan of levying financial burdens solely upon those best able to bear them is impractical. It is simple justice; and justice, after all, is the most practical thing in the world.

Here is an opportunity to adopt a policy worthy of this throbbing dynamic year. By our action we may remove some of the shame from our splendor, some of the brutality from our business, and turn the course of America onward and upward toward real brotherhood, away from the downward path of savage greed and brutal lust for gain.

And, gentlemen of the House, if we walk now with unfaltering footsteps, future generations will follow with sureness and safety. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I would like the Clerk to read, which I propose to offer at the proper time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Page 23, line 12, strike out the words "or advertising space other than in newspapers and periodicals," so that the section will read:

"SEC. 504. That from and after the 1st day of June, 1917, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the amount paid by any person, corporation, partnership, or association to any other person, corporation, partnership, or association for advertising."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced the amendment for the information of the committee and at the proper time shall ask for its consideration. While I have placed the tax on advertising at 5 per cent, it can be made any reasonable figure—4 per cent, 3 per cent, or even 2 per cent. That can be decided when we reach amendments under the five-minute rule. Also, I desire to give notice that when title 12, which carries the zone system for second-class mail matter, is reached, I shall move to strike out the whole title. I judge that the Committee on Ways and Means desired to take some toll from advertising which is carried on in the United States to the amount of at least $1,000,000,000 a year. I believe that Congress will back up the idea to make modern advertising, which has grown to such proportions that it has actually become a great factor in the high cost of living, pay some of the expenses of carrying on this war.

I understand the committee endeavored to find some way to tax advertising; that the members failed to agree upon a plan, and finally endeavored to strike the whole thing from the bill. I presume that section 504, which taxes outdoor advertising and lets all other advertising go scot free, was left in the bill by mistake. The section should not remain in the bill unless it is so amended to apply to all advertising that can be reached by the Government. The committee estimates that the 5 per cent tax on outdoor advertising will bring in seven and a half million dollars. I doubt if it will bring in one and a half million—probably not one million. I will tell you one reason why. Simply because many of the largest advertisers do their own outdoor advertising—concerns such as the Ingersoll Watch and Castoria. The minute you put 5 per cent on the organized sign business you drive other national advertisers into doing their own work. Away goes the 5 per cent you hope to get for your war chest. Besides, if you tax, as the committee proposes, one line of advertising and not other lines, you drive the big advertisers to the untaxed lines. But a 5 per cent tax—or a 3 per cent tax, if you prefer—will bring in a great sum, and bring it in to a certainty. Five per cent, fifty millions or more. Three per cent, thirty millions, and the beauty of it is the Government gets it and does not bankrupt a whole lot of periodicals with a lopsided zone system, or put one branch of big advertising agents practically out of business by taxing them alone.

Hundreds of publishers of newspapers and periodicals who are writing to Members of Congress say in their letters and statements that they are perfectly willing to bear a full proportion of the war tax. They are willing to give up their profits, many of them say. We will take it that they are. But they do not want to be taxed through a zone system two or three times as much as their profits amount to. And that is exactly what will happen, as I shall show you in a moment. I firmly believe the way is to place a tax on all advertising that can be reached by Uncle Sam. Then it extends to practically all advertising, including the advertising paid for by automobile agents who endeavor to enlarge their business by advertising. This would be a much more proper tax to reach that class than a direct tax of 5 per cent on sales of automobiles, as now in the bill.

Much has been said about the unanimity of the Ways and Means Committee with respect to this war-tax measure. I suspect that the members of that great committee are only in accord because, after wrestling with the bill for three weeks, they found that they could not agree on any rational plan, and therefore reached a sort of truce by which they left all sorts of taxation schemes in the bill—good, bad, and indifferent—and then threw the whole thing into the House and dared the Members to vote against it [applause], a sort of Robin Hood method without rhyme or reason except that the Government needs the money. The Government does not need it, neither to-day nor to-morrow nor until this measure is made as nearly equitable as possible. [Applause.] I think that all must realize that if this bill is not extensively amended in the House it will be practically rewritten in another body, and that it will be fully a month before it is ready for the President's signature.

The trouble is, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that we are trying in this bill to provide for a "pay-as-you-enter" war, which accounts for some of the peculiarities of the bill. It undertakes to seize profits in advance that are not yet profits, and to a dead certainty will not be profits under some sections of this measure—the automobile-sales section, for instance—and it fails to take profits that have already been made from war and will continue to be made. In criticism of that last failure I concur in what has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY]. This bill puts a tax of 10 cents on each deck of playing cards, which is beyond all reason. It puts an import tax on coffee and a tax of 1 cent per pound on its selling price. If the committee wants some suggestions, it would be far better, in my opinion, rather than have a double tax on coffee, to make it an absolute Government monopoly, particularly as it is proposed right now to bring in and pass a bill to regulate food prices. And on that regulation I agree again with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. HELVERING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will; certainly.

Mr. HELVERING. Just for a suggestion, that the import tax of 10 per cent is one matter and the 1 per cent applies only to this quantity of coffee in store which will be taken out on withdrawing it from the customhouse.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not object to the 10 per cent import tax. But there is one item, which can be handled entirely by the Government at a real profit and at a minimum of damage, as well as a saving to——

Mr. HELVERING. I thought the gentleman in his statement did not understand the 1 cent part of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I did not, and I am glad to be informed. That is why we are having this debate. But, Mr. Chairman, I think I understand what the zone system of second-class postage rates for the carrying of magazines and newspapers through the mails will do. The committee seems to have put the zone system in for the purpose of punishing a few big magazines. That very statement has been made on this floor. Incidentally it will put out a large number of smaller ones, including, for instance, the National Geographic Mazagine, whose editor announces that if the zone system becomes the law his publication will suspend until after the war. In addition to putting a lot of publications out of business, the zone system will be a source of continued trouble and mischief to all publications, and particularly to the small daily and weekly throughout the entire United States, as I shall show. The zone system, as a rule, will restrain and embarrass the newspaper and printing industry from top to bottom, and——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the gentleman does not intend later on to cover this, does the gentleman mind stating about what the difference would amount to of the average city daily—I do not mean the great metropolitan dailies like Chicago or New York, but, for instance, like the gentleman's own paper?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have not time to discuss metropolitan dailies We know that the metropolitan dailies like those of Minneapolis, Boston, New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, and so forth, reach far beyond two zones, or 150 miles, in influence and circulation.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Take a paper like the one the gentleman knows most about—his own paper, which was exhibited here Saturday and analyzed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]—the cost of transportation of its product will not be materially changed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It will not. It does not even take much advantage of the "free in county" privilege. Nine-tenths of its circulation is delivered by its own carriers. It now pays the Post Office Department, I suppose, about $4 or $5 a month for second-class rates on papers to annual subscribers scattered from Maine to Panama. If I can secure additional time I may discuss in connection with other small papers my own daily newspaper publication, inasmuch as on Saturday it was exhibited to the House, but I sincerely hope that the Members of this House will not subscribe for the Daily Washingtonian, because it is published 3,300 miles away and 6 cents a pound would be too much for me to pay to send it to you. [Laughter.] Particularly, as your Ways and Means Committee says in this bill, "6 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the eighth zone." That is to say, one single 4-page county newspaper from more than 1,800 miles away to Washington, D. C., 6 cents. [Laughter.] Why, you can send the thing third-class from Hoquiam to Porto Rico for 1 cent. Or to Toronto, Canada, for 1 cent, and the British Government will forward it around the world if you are traveling—send it from place to place—to London, to Hongkong, to Bombay, and back again, for that same little old 1-cent stamp with Ben Franklin's picture on it. But under the zone system, 6 cents! Think of it! Six cents a week for the editor of the Tombstone Epitaph to send one issue of that delectable paper to Arizona's lone Congressman here in Washington. Well, if Tombstone's weekly paper is not a dead one now, it will be if this bill becomes a law, and no mistake.

Mr. HELVERING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. With pleasure.

Mr. HELVERING. I understood from the gentleman's amendment he intends to put 5 per cent on advertising?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; or any other small per cent if this committee so wills.

Mr. HELVERING. We took the trouble to inquire of 57 of the small newspapers in the district which I have the honor to represent as to what 5 per cent on advertising would mean, and we find this would run 15 to 25 per cent on the total amount which they receive above running expenses.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, it might. I doubt if it runs that much. At any rate, the small newspapers would pass it on to the jeweler, the automobile agent, the tailor, the real-estate agent, and so on, and each one of them would know that through his advertising in his home paper he was helping to finance the war.

Mr. HELVERING. If the gentleman's amendment should be agreed upon there should be some exemption like that carried in the excess-profits tax.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, not many. Some advertisers, of course, never pay their bills.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see what this zone system does to certain high-class periodicals. First, it adds to the general confusion by creating a zone system different from the parcel-post zone system It consolidates the eight parcel-post zones into six zones and makes the newspaper and periodical rate as follows:

Zones.	Distance.	Present rate.	Zone rate.	Increase.
	Miles.	Cents.	Cents.	Per cent.
First and second zones	50 to 150	1	2	100
Third zone	150 to 300	1	3	200
Fourth and fifth zones	300 to 1,000	1	4	300

The publishers are required to put up their newspapers for mailing according to zones. This will be a considerable task for the smaller newspapers who may have here and there a subscriber in the fifth, sixth, or eighth zones. These publishers will have to resort to the intricate key, map, and guide system which is provided by the Post Office Department, and which is described in the United States Official Postal Guide on numerous pages.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like an additional 10 minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. I yield the gentleman 15 additional minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Think of the high-grade publications that this scheme will put out of business. Take, for instance, the Outlook, published by Dr. Lyman Abbott in New York at $3 per year. It pays to the Federal Government 25 cents per year per copy for postage. If a subscriber lives in Canada, the Outlook pays for him $1.04 to the Government, and probably charges the subscriber $1 extra. If this zone system remains in this bill, the Outlook will have to pay for all of its subscribers who live a little farther west than Chicago $1.25 additional postage. For a high-class publication such as the Outlook this rate would be prohibitive to citizens west of the Missouri River, who would have to pay a premium of at least $1 more than their fellow citizens in the East for the privilege of reading that splendid publication. The Outlook does not pretend to be a great money-maker. It has not prostituted its columns to advertising. One year of zone system will take fully twice as much as the Outlook's annual profits, and what, then, becomes of the Outlook?

Consider the case of the Youth's Companion, with 400,000 subscribers scattered to thousands of post offices all over the United States. That paper, which is not a heavy advertising medium, has in the State of California 14,372 paid subscribers. It has in the State of Washington 7,317 subscribers. Six copies of the paper make a pound. The publishers have contracted to deliver it for a year to all of these subscribers at $2 each. They are paying 1 cent per pound. They are asked to pay 6 cents, not only for these on the Pacific coast, but for all west of some point this side of Chicago—the exact point I can not locate unless I have a Post Office Department map and key. For every subscription to the Youth's Companion west of that point 6 cents per pound must be paid. That applies to a lot of States—Missouri, Iowa, Arkansas, Texas, North and South Dakota, and others, and all of the intermountain and Pacific coast. Probably most of you Congressmen took the Youth's Companion when you were boys and your children and grandchildren take it now. It weighs 6 copies to the pound. So every five weeks it would pay 5 cents more than now. That would be charged to all subscribers west of the Missouri River. Is that fair?

I asked that question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] during his two-hour speech in advocacy of this zone plan Saturday in this form:

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the Curtis publications are as high class as the gentleman says, is there any reason on earth why you should make the Saturday Evening Post cost 5 cents in Washington, D. C., and, say, 15 cents in the State of Washington?

And the following debate occurred:

Mr. RAINEY. Of course. Magazines have two prices—one for the United States and one for Canada.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But I do not live in Canada.

Mr. RAINEY. The magazine that circulates in the United States for $4 a year sells in Canada for $6.50 a year. It is just as easy if they want to add the zone postage to the subscription price—it is just as easy to change the price across the zone lines as it is across the Canadian border.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But it is an added expense to the people in the eighth zone.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; but the less you get of the greater part of this literature the better, even if you are in the eighth zone.

As a matter of fact, unless the Saturday Evening Post could reach the Pacific coast by means of a low express rate, its retail price out there under this proposed system would be 11 cents. And think of the many other publications to which the 25,000,000 people of the Western States are subscribers.

I made a similar inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] yesterday, and he made a reply that he would not answer; that he was opposed to sectionalism in this bill. Of course it is not sectionalism to charge all the people west of the Missouri River six times as much for the use of the second-class mail service as is charged the people living in the great populous center within a few hundred miles of New York or within a few hundred miles of Chicago. It is stupidity.

It is not sectionalism to charge a newspaper publisher 6 cents for sending a 1-pound copy of his Sunday newspaper from Washington, D. C., to Tacoma, Wash., and then let any one of you mail the Sunday Washington Post from this city to the Pacific coast for 4 cents under the third-class rates. It is thoughtlessness.

All high-class publications have not prostituted their columns to the advertising game. All are willing to pay a large part of their profits for the cost of this war, but they do not want to be put out of business. I read a letter from the publisher of the Pacific Poultryman, out my way. He says:

I assure you that I believe that not one sound of protest would come at this time of crisis in our country's history from any publisher if he were asked to give only his all, in the way of profits, in order to produce additional revenue for the Government. But it is a fact that if the postal rate be raised by a zone system many, many publishers will be annihilated. Should many have to go out of business the Government would not gain by it.

Why, Mr. Chairman, for that man to send his poultry journal across his own State of Washington would carry him into the fourth and fifth zones. The State is fully 500 miles long. California is at least 1,000 miles long.

It was argued by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] that if eastern papers could be shut out from the western country we might establish such publications of our own. The number of zones per State makes this unlikely, with the high cost of paper and our comparatively limited population. The four-five zone rate in Washington State would shut the Seattle and Tacoma papers out of Spokane and the Spokane papers out of the coast cities. The zone system would make the State of Washington's Sunday papers cost a quarter apiece in Alaska. I——

Mr. SLOAN. One question, please. Is it not a fact, which you know as a newspaper man, that most of these advertising matters are contracted for the year and would run from now until January without relief?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and that is one of the objections to the zone system, by the way. We can change the amendment I have offered to read "January 1" instead of "June 1" and relieve the situation somewhat.

Gentlemen, the zone system is not a war tax but a clumsy effort to further punish some great big periodicals and to repress and embarrass the newspaper industry—perhaps because they freely criticize Congress. It went out of the Post Office appropriation bill on a point of order made simultaneously by not less than 60 Members, each striving for that privilege. Now, it turns up in this bill, where it does not belong, and occupies most of the time of debate Saturday and most of the day yesterday. Its principal advocate declares that its real purpose is to take toll from a few gigantic publications, primarily the Curtis publications, without caring what must happen to lesser but equally valuable publications. It raises the second-class rate in some cases 500 per cent. Think of it, 500 per cent! Who cares? It will put the National Geographic Magazine out of business. Who cares? But why should that great magazine suspend publication? Is it not exempt from the zone system, which exempts the educational and certain other publications? Is it not educational? I asked two members of the committee, and they said "No." Well, who knows? What a lot of trouble that little word "educational" will raise if the zone section remains in this bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The word "educational" in the gentleman's discussion of the meaning of the word reminds me that in the last number of the Saturday Evening Post I read an article by Blythe on the present situation in China, which is the most interesting and instructive and thoroughly up-to-date and educational article on China I have seen.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Certainly, and there is no doubt but this National Geographic Magazine is as highly an educational publication for people as any other publication in the United States; and it sells, I think, for $2 per year. Their bills for illustrations, I believe, run into many thousands of dollars. That is the kind of periodicals we are willing to put out of business, along with Comfort, which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] poked so much fun at in his speech. But Comfort might be called an educational paper, because the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] showed that it tried to teach the gentle art of kissing. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORLAND. Would the gentleman care to yield at that point?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is a practical publisher——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, in a very small way.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to ask him about a suggestion that has been made to me. There is no limit now on the amount of advertising space that a magazine or paper can send out in connection with the little reading matter that is sent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No.

Mr. BORLAND. That is the main difficulty. Now, I want to ask the gentleman a question. I have a suggestion here from a publisher in Kansas City, in my district, in which he suggests that advertising pages be rated 8 cents a pound and reading-matter space at 1 cent a pound.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would not object to that. I would not object to anything that would fall with some equality on all publishers.

Mr. BORLAND. Is not that a practical suggestion, from the gentleman's standpoint?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think so; but it would require a great deal of inquiry because of fluctuations.

Mr. BORLAND. It seems to me that when the paper was submitted as second-class mail it could designate its advertising space and reading space.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let us hope that that will be discussed under the five-minute rule.

Mr. Chairman, for myself I can not vote for the war-revenue bill with this zone system in it. The bill will have to be amended in numerous particulars before it gets my vote. Should I then vote for it, I shall do so because of its tariff feature. The flat 10 per cent increase should be raised on a whole lot of things. Why?

I present for your consideration the official statement of the customs business for the district of Washington for the month of March. Examine it and you find that for that month there was imported into that single district in the northwestern corner of the United States goods to the value of $22,326,828, of which nearly all came in free. The exact figures there are:

Free	$21,026,888
Dutiable	1,299,940

Every month the customhouse statement from that district for the past two years has shown a similar proportion. Not a month has passed in that time but that from ten to fifteen millions of dollars worth of goods has come in free, while those paying duty have amounted in value to but five hundred to one million dollars. The amount received for customs duties in all that time has hardly been sufficient for the upkeep of the Puget Sound customhouses. For the month of March, as shown by this statement, the duty collected was $203,742.

Imports from Japan during the first eight months of the current fiscal year totaled $131,551,000, an increase slightly over 100 per cent compared with imports for the similar period for 1912–13 under protection. Japan is running us out of foreign markets in the Far East and invading our own home market. She is giving preference to Japanese goods in her vessels and holding up our own. Her cotton textile exports doubled during 1916 over 1915.

Within the past month more than $8,000,000 in gold have been released by the Federal Treasury for shipment to Japan in settlement of the trade balance, which continues to remain so largely favorable to that country. This balance is made possible by the large sales which Japan makes to us by reason of the free access which the Democratic tariff gives her to American markets. Yet in considering plans for the production of war revenue the Democratic financiers in Congress have resolutely refused to pay any attention to suggestions that additional duties beyond this flat rate of 10 per cent shall be laid upon the foreign goods which are coming to our ports despite the war.

Imports from China increased 90 per cent during the first eight months of the current fiscal year ended February 28, compared with the similar period, 1912–13, under the protective tariff law, or from $26,600,000 for the 1912–13 period to $50,267,000 for the 1916–17 period.

The first eight months of the current fiscal year ended February 28 found Canada running old mother England a close heat in the race for control of a large share of the American market, $181,300,000 worth of Canadian commodities being imported by us compared with $181,627,000 worth of goods "made in England."

This is an increase over our total imports from Canada for the similar period, 1912–13, under a protective tariff law, of just $100,000,000.

Canada soaks us a healthy customs tax for the privilege of doing business in her market, averaging over 20 per cent on all our exports to her. We permit over 90 per cent of her exports to enter our market free of duty.

England raised something like $342,000,000 from customs duties during her fiscal year 1916–17. Ours will produce only about $210,000,000 by June 30, when our fiscal year closes. Let us raise some revenue at the right places—the customhouses.

With such an amount of free trade to the United States going on it is no wonder that we have to turn every which way for taxes in an effort to make up the actual deficit in the Treasury before we start the collection of a war fund. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] 15 minutes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss briefly the proposed changes in second-class postal rates. It is true that the amount paid by the publishers of newspapers direct to the Government, if considered by itself, may appear insufficient, but if what the publishers do for the public free of charge is taken into account I believe it will be found that they pay their full share of the cost of the handling of the mails.

Sound and efficient government must rest upon an intelligent, educated public opinion. For that reason it is highly desirable that the citizens of the country should be well informed upon all public questions and all details of government. In this field the newspapers give space worth many millions. Almost every public official, from the President of the United States down to a forest ranger, secures valuable publicity. The President's addresses are sent in advance of delivery to newspapers in all portions of the country, "released for publication" upon the date of delivery. Thousands upon thousands of newspapers print these speeches.

Then, the Cabinet officers send out immense quantities of publicity matter, telling of the activities of their respective departments. And they are quite imperious about it, subordinate officers in some of the bureaus sending out items with directions like this:

> Released for use by papers on ———, 1917, or thereafter. Publications disregarding the release date will be stricken from the mailing list.

And so it goes through the entire category of officeholders, the editors giving the needed publicity to governmental activities. The Postmaster General himself, who discusses this subject in one of his annual reports now before me, gets for the Government advertising of immense value, covering one of the greatest business enterprises in the world—the Post Office Department.

Then the newspapers give to the public without charge a very large amount of valuable advertising space in support of State, county, city, charitable, religious, and other activities, which, if taken into account, would run into very large sums of money. And this is the class of citizens upon whom the catalogue-house men would descend with the idea of wringing from them rates sufficiently increased to enable the Government to give them a reduced rate upon first-class mail matter.

It is a well-established principle among large business concerns that certain lines must be handled at little or no profit. In the conduct of the great Post Office Department thoughtful people can not fail to realize the wisdom of encouraging the circulation of mediums of publicity. There is no telling to what extent letters are written carrying first-class postage about matters advertised in newspapers, big and small. They stimulate all kinds of business. Advertising is the backbone of the Postal Department; cripple it, and its sources of revenue from the sale of first-class postage will be tremendously reduced. The prudent business man will not thoughtlessly cause a radical reduction in his chief source of income. The proposed change in second-class rates displays a lack of statesmanship.

The value of publicity to the departments of the Government is little appreciated by those who have not stopped to think about it. Almost every governmental activity requires publicity. The President of the United States appreciates this, if some other officials forget it. In a recent address he used these words:

> I beg that all editors and publishers everywhere will give as prominent publication and as wide circulation as possible to this appeal.
> What is worth asking for is worth paying for.

Mr. Chairman, when I listened to the interesting and entertaining address a few days ago of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], in which he devoted considerable time to the newspaper published by the gentleman who has just been speaking [Mr. JOHNSON of Washington], I thought that he would probably have something to say about his own paper to-day. But he has been very modest. I sent over to the Library of Congress for the paper published by Representative JOHNSON, because I was interested to look it over after hearing the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

I find, after looking it over, that if the United States Government had paid to the publishers of the Hoquiam Daily Washingtonian a fair price for all the advertising given to this Government they could afford to send this paper out by first-class postage. [Applause.]

Now, here is a list that I have prepared of the different items that appeared in one issue of that paper that seemed to me to be of great value to this Government. There is a Red Cross item of 33 lines. Newspapers in North Dakota of the character of this paper would charge more than 10 cents a line for reading matter, but we will figure it at 10 cents a line. That would make $3.30. There is an article on crop stimulation, very important at this particular time, 247 lines. That would be $24.70. There is an announcement there of 54 lines made by a United States representative, the county agent. That would be worth $5.40. Then there is another Red Cross item of 4 lines. Then the county agent makes a very complimentary statement with respect to the activity in gardens in that locality. That would make $6.20. There is an article on the sale of war bonds, 27 lines, $2.70. Then there is another Red Cross item of 4 lines, 40 cents. There is a statement, prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture—a very important statement—with respect to food conservation, and this particular statement was given a place in the editorial columns of this paper, 60 lines. That would be $6. These items total up to $52.1

Now, there are a number of other articles in this paper that I think ought to be paid for, too, although they are a little more general in character. I have not, however, itemized them. There is an article on "Lack of engines hampering shipbuilding"; another one on "Government wooden shipyards"; another one, "Army to France at once." There is another one headed, "Balfour says all must help to win."

I want to say, too, that this list I have given you does not have anything to do with the matters that help out the State, the city, and the county governments, and the fraternities and churches and cards of thanks. Not a single one of those items has been included.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for an inquiry?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I assume that the gentleman did not select that particular edition that had a particularly large amount of free material of this class. It was just an ordinary edition?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes. My secretary simply sent over to the Library of Congress and asked to have an issue of this paper sent across. I presume it is an ordinary sample. I want to say it is an excellent paper. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. With pleasure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman do me the favor to let me say that I have not edited the paper and have not been concerned with its editing and publishing for five years? I want to say, however, that it is sent free to the Library of Congress, and is the daily paper published farthest west in continental United States. I am proud to have it sent. [Applause.]

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I want to say to the gentleman that I think this issue of May 9 is a fair sample of the paper. Any way it was the paper that was sent over to me from the Library at my request for a copy. It was not specially put up for the purposes of this comparison. I presume there are a large number of other similar papers published in the United States, and it seems to me we would be doing a great injustice to small daily papers and other publications printed throughout the country if we should enact the zone rates contained in this bill. I have a telegram from one of the papers of my own State which reads like this:

> The war taxes on this paper will amount to from $12,000 to $15,000 per year, which we can not stand.

I happen to know that that paper did not pay a dividend last year. The telegram proceeds:

> Many other papers will be as badly situated. The print paper situation has almost broken our backs and added expense will complete the job of putting us out of business. We are willing to give up all profits, if there should be any, but further we can not go.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Are we to understand that this particular newspaper, which now is not doing more than breaking even and not making a dividend, will be compelled by the Government to pay $12,000 to $15,000 taxes? Is that the gentleman's statement?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. This is the statement I have received. It probably refers to the postage rate.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman say that this bill is going to tax that paper $12,000?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I suppose that it is the computation of what the increased postage bill will amount to.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman thinks that has reference to the increased postage?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Undoubtedly that is what he has reference to.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand it, these papers will not be subject to the advertising tax in the newspapers. Is that the gentleman's understanding?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes; that is my understanding. I am discussing the question of the zone system as proposed in this bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask the gentleman if his attention has been called to the National Tribune, the soldiers' publication, the organ of the Grand Army of the Republic, published in Washington, D C.? That has about 150,000 subscribers, scattered all over the United States, in every district, in every State. I have received a letter from the publisher of that paper stating that this bill would practically put that paper out of business. It has not any large local circulation. Its circulation is general, and this increase in the postage rate would simply prevent the publication of the official organ of the Grand Army of the Republic.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. My attention had not been called to that publication; but it seems to me that that paper and papers like the Christian Science Monitor, at Boston, which has a general circulation throughout the United States, and many other such publications, might better have been cited as examples of current literature by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] than picking out an isolated paper here and there, like the ones the gentleman selected in Maine. It seems to me we ought not to legislate here against particular papers like that in such a way as to at the same time deal a body blow to papers like the Christian Science Monitor, the cleanest daily in the United States; the National Tribune; and other high-class publications.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Not disparaging this particular paper in any way, would the gentleman claim that if he would inspect any other daily paper published in the United States he would not find it contains just as many articles of merit as this particular publication contains?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I think that is true. I have examined some North Dakota papers that I will not take the time to read from, those that came to my desk yesterday, and I find that in a general way the newspapers throughout the country are cooperating with this Government, not only in this war, but with every activity of the Government. They are also giving valuable publicity to the State and municipal governments. It seems to be the disposition of the editors to help along all public agencies. Here is a clipping from the Leader, published at Fargo. The same notice was in many other State papers. It reads:

FARM HELP AVAILABLE—REGISTER YOUR NEEDS.

Gov. Frazier has wired advice from Chicago that hundreds of experienced farm hands are registered with the Daily News for employment.

As no provision was made by the last legislative assembly for the labor department to establish a labor bureau, the department is considerably handicapped and without any available funds, nevertheless, I have secured promise of Federal assistance and in the meantime, our office force will devote whatever time is necessary for securing and distributing farm labor, and I respectfully request county officers, farmers, and others to register the needs in their locality with the department of agriculture and labor, Bismarck, N. Dak., stating wages and term of employment, and I further desire the newspapers to cooperate in giving this information general circulation.

J. N. HAGAN,
Commissioner of Agriculture and Labor.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I will.

Mr. FESS. The statement was made a while ago that there was no justification in continuing the publication of a newspaper that was not sufficiently profitable. That was based on the statement that the reading matter was not profitable, but that the advertising is. What does my friend say about the discontinuing of reading matter because it is not profitable?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. My view would be this, that if all of the newspapers should suspend publication to-morrow that are not profitable, that are not making money aside from the job printing, the United States would be in a difficult position to get the required publicity needed at this time.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Isn't it true that the class of newspapers containing the most reading matter are the high-grade papers that would be the first to go out of business?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. That is true, and among the first would be the religious papers printed throughout all the United States, and many other high-class weekly publications.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. For a question.

Mr. DALLINGER. Is it not a fact that many agricultural papers throughout the country would be put out of business by the bill in its present form?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I do not know whether they would be put out of business, but it would be a severe blow to them, and I have no doubt that many would have to go out of business.

Mr. McKENZIE. Are not the farm papers exempt under this bill?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I do not think they are; and besides, I do not think they ask for an exemption excepting such as would also include all other legitimate newspapers.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. Does the gentleman know of any newspaper publisher in the country that publishes any paper or magazine anywhere that is in favor of this provision of the bill?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I have not heard of any.

Mr. FOCHT. Does the gentleman know of any that are against it?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. As far as I have heard from, they are all opposed to it, and it seems to me that in stating the reasons they have given good reasons.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman from North Dakota allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman has referred to the local papers throughout the country. I understand that there is a provision in the bill excepting the daily paper where it is deposited in post offices which have letter carriers for delivery by these carriers from the payment of any increase of postage—that is, that the postage shall remain the same as it is now.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Such letter carriers are not permitted to carry daily newspapers.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I did not hear all that the gentleman said in reference to the agricultural papers. All the agricultural papers or fraternal papers published not for profit of the stockholders are exempt. I will gladly extend the gentleman's time 10 minutes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. All of the agricultural papers in the United States that amount to anything are published for profit. If there is one that comes into my district that is not published for profit I do not know its name.

Mr. FORDNEY. If a certain number of gentlemen, Members of the House, publish an agricultural paper for special profit, ought they not to be taxed?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes; they ought to pay a reasonable tax. The publishers are willing to pay a reasonable amount. We are talking about this bill that makes an unreasonable demand, a requirement which in many cases will amount to confiscation. A reasonable rate should take into account the services rendered to the Government by the newspapers. But there is a bigger and broader question involved in the consideration of this subject. A free democracy is dependent upon a free public opinion, and a sound, rational, broad, intelligent public opinion is formed by a press of which a portion at least must be nation wide in scope and circulation. Dr. Lyman Abbott affirms that one contributing cause of the Civil War was that the North and South did not understand each other. One contributing cause of the great European war is that the nations speak different languages and do not understand each other. Patriotism calls for legislation making mutual understanding easier and better. The proposed legislation makes mutual understanding more difficult. It tends to denationalize the Nation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] has all along claimed that the high postal rates would result in taxing the advertisers, but they will raise the subscription price to correspond to the zone rates.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I think that is possible, but the serious objection is not only that the subscribers will have to pay more but that many will cease to take the publications.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question about that as to those that have a national circulation.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I think it would be a loss to the country for farmers to cease to take these agricultural papers that come now to their homes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I will.

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to read the language of the bill. Page 52, line 20, says:

Provided further, That in the case of newspapers and periodicals entitled to be entered as second-class matter and maintained by and in the interests of religious, educational, philanthropic, agricultural, labor, or fraternal organizations, not organized for profit and none of the net income of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman from North Dakota allow me a word in reply?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is it not true in this class of publications, as in many others, that what is everybody's business is nobody's business. These publications that are not published for profit contain matter that is really fraternal correspondence, matter that only interests those who take them, and it only circulates in that little circle of those who write for it?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes; that is true.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I did not read far enough.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Well, let us have the rest of it.

Mr. FORDNEY. I made a serious mistake. The class of papers that I referred to pay at the rate of 1½ cents a pound, and do not come under the zone rates.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have in my hand a typewritten statement from one of the leading publications of the United States, which shows its entire net income this year and estimates that under the zone system which is announced the Government would collect not only the entire amount of the net income but four times its entire net income. That is what the zone system does.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was furnished this morning a statement from the accountant of the publication of Hoard's Dairyman, a newspaper of national circulation and of national repute, the leading dairy paper of the country, which shows that if the zone rates in the bill under consideration are put into force it would amount to more than the net income of the paper. The paper has a very large circulation in the fourth and fifth zones, particularly in New York State, and in those zones alone the total increase of postage under this bill would amount to $21,000.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Those statements ought to have some influence upon this House, if they have not had any upon the Committee on Ways and Means. Hoard's Dairyman? It takes me back to boyhood.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, every man taking part in the preparation of this bill or who expects to vote for or against the bill knows that advertising and the price of the paper heretofore fixed by the publisher has been based upon the cost thereof, and the present rate of postage had much to do with that cost. Therefore everyone knows that if the rate of postage is increased the proprietor of that newspaper must get more for his advertising or his paper or go out of business. Every sensible man knows that. What is the use of arguing that question?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I want to ask the gentleman whether he has placed any other industry in the United States upon that basis?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me to make a statement in reply to the gentleman from Michigan as to the basis of advertising?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the basis of advertising as testified to many times before the Committee on the Post Office is one-half cent a line for every 1,000 subscribers. The gentleman from Michigan is pursuing the idea that by raising the subscription price the subscribers will be increased, when, as a matter of fact, by raising the price the rate of advertising will be materially reduced. If he was in favor of taxing advertisements, why did not the committee levy a tax upon advertisements in general, as was suggested by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], as every other man knows, with a teaspoonfull of brains, knows that every article in this country, agricultural or manufactured, has been increased in price since the war began in Europe, and it has added to the cost of that article to the consumer. Let me answer that by saying that everyone knows that every time the price of an article goes up in this country that increase goes on to the consumer whenever it can be put there. That is true in taxes and it is true in the increased cost in the production. That is true in increased profits, and it is true in everything that tends to raise the price of any article, agricultural or manufactured. It must go to the consumer.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from North Dakota yield to me in order that I may ask the gentleman from Michigan a question?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I did not mean to be sarcastic, but I just got riled.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I want to ask the gentleman from Michigan a question, if the gentleman from North Dakota will permit.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. As I understand the position of the gentleman from Michigan it is that the consumer, the American people, are finally to pay all this in any event through the price of the subscription or the price of the advertising rates.

Mr. FORDNEY. The Outlook told you that in their little circular which they sent around the day before yesterday.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I have not asked the question yet, if the gentleman will permit me to finish the question.

Mr. FORDNEY. Very well.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Suppose the advertisers refuse to pay the increased price of advertising, and suppose the subscribers refuse to subscribe for the journal at an increased price, will not that force the periodical out of business, and is not that the contention that is made?

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman as a lawyer represents a client in court, and he increases his fees, the man either pays the increase or goes to some other attorney, does he not?

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Certainly.

Mr. FORDNEY. When I go to the market to buy an article and I feel that the merchant is asking me too much for it, I try to buy it somewhere else, but if I must have it I buy it at the best price that I can obtain it for, do I not?

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Does not the gentleman know that the subscription price of a paper or a magazine may be put so high that a man will not want it or subscribe for it?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and I know also that attorneys' fees may be put so high that they can keep me out of court—although they may not keep me out of jail. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to yield me two or three minutes more.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Michigan has forgotten the fact that we passed laws here requiring all newspapers should be paid for in advance, and he is attempting to show that after a newspaper has made a contract with all of its subscribers it can advance the price immediately. He is proposing to tax the newspapers over 100 per cent of their profits, and he is expecting them to get back on the people and raise the price, when they have a contract with them for a year ahead.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not want to disturb the gentleman's argument, but that is exactly what is going to happen to certain business men who have made contracts.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I do not think it is a parallel case, and I do not believe the gentleman will claim that. This is a business where the law requires the paper shall be paid for in advance, and presumably all these papers have contracts with their subscribers to send the paper at a certain price.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I sympathize with the gentleman's argument, but I observe that that is what is going to happen to business men.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. A war tax should be something temporary, something easily repealed when the emergency is past. This proposal has every earmark of permanent legislation.

The gentleman from Michigan has entirely evaded answering the statement made when I began speaking, and that was that these newspapers, many of them, particularly the paper I read from, contained enough advertising for this Government, if paid for at reasonable rates, to have paid for its circulation at first-class postage rates. The gentleman has not answered that proposition.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, in that connection, assuming what is true in regard to this newspaper is true in regard to other newspapers in the United States, the question is now, Does the gentleman contend that the United States Government should pay a bonus to newspapers or permit them to go through the first-class mail because they contain first-class articles in the interest of the Government?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. My contention is that when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] stated that the newspapers of this country were grafters there never was a greater slander uttered. [Applause.] They are men who have been paying their way, giving the Government full compensation; that is my contention. [Applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I will.

Mr. FOCHT. Does it not really become a question whether you are going to put them out of business or not? Now, we all know on account of the increased cost of print paper the daily papers under it have been raised 100 per cent; and if you are going to increase the cost to the subscriber 100 per cent, then the original proposition of encouraging the circulation of papers to extend a wider zone of intelligence, such as the gentleman refers to, will be defeated, will it not?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. FOCHT. Then, in the gentleman's opinion, something must be done with these magazines; but the manner in which this bill has been framed is such that it is clumsy and hopelessly impossible and not acceptable to the newspaper publishers, and hence to the people, because they could not subscribe to the newspapers they desired to take. I understand that to be the real conclusion.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The gentleman has expressed the situation so well that I am not going to take any more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS]. [Applause.]

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HELVERING] has given me 25 minutes, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] has agreed to yield me additional time if I desire it. I wish to present the conditions that surround the automobile industry in America to-day in a connected form, and I shall ask the privilege of proceeding for 25 minutes without interruption. At the end of that time I shall be very glad to yield for any question that any Member may desire to ask me.

I listened with deep interest to the remarks of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in presenting this bill to the House. I agree with many statements that he made. I agree with him that at this time every citizen should do his duty and every manufacturer and producer should be willing to surrender all of his profits if necessary to a successful prosecution of this war. [Applause.] I agree with him that we should cast aside every selfish thought and purpose in the consideration of this bill. I agree with him that if this tax falls heavily upon this or that district it affords no justification to a Member from that district for opposing the tax. I do not agree with him, however, that the badge of patriotism in this hour is a meek submission to every line, sentence, paragraph, and section in the bill. The gentleman from North Carolina is just as patriotic as I am, but no more so. Both he and I may be called upon to make the supreme sacrifice before this war is over. The real badge of patriotism to-day is a faithful performance of one's duty as he sees it; and I submit to the gentleman from North Carolina that if there is a section or paragraph in this bill which does violence to the plain principles of justice, no amount of patriotic eloquence should be permitted to obscure it or deter men from the performance of what they regard their plain duty. [Applause.]

I speak to-day not in behalf of any particular district, but in behalf of a great American industry which is now being seriously threatened and to which over 2,000,000 of our people look for a livelihood. This bill provides a tax of 5 per cent upon the gross sales of automobile manufacturers in addition to the excess-profits tax and the corporation tax. Now, how does it work out? This bill says to the steel manufacturer, "If you make a profit of 8 per cent, we will take a portion of the excess."

It says to the automobile manufacturer, "We will take 5 per cent of your total sales whether you make a profit or not."

It says to the copper manufacturer, "You are entitled to a profit of 8 per cent before the Government will tax you."

It says to the automobile manufacturer, "We will gather a tax of 5 per cent upon your business first, and you can take your chance of making a profit afterwards."

It says to the woolen manufacturer, "If your sales exceed your operating cost over 8 per cent, we will take a part of the excess."

It says to the automobile manufacturer, "We will take 5 per cent of your sales regardless of what your cost of operation may be."

It protects the right of the steel manufacturer, the iron manufacturer, and the other great manufacturers to a reasonable profit but denies it to the automobile manufacturer.

Upon the threshold of the most critical period of this Nation's history, when every citizen is expected to do his duty and in return is entitled from his Government to a fair distribution of the burdens of this war, we are confronted by an invidious discrimination that places one great manufacturing industry under a burden that is not borne by the others. No adequate reason has been given for it because none can be given. I charge that the Committee on Ways and Means in preparing this bill reached the conclusion to tax the automobile industry without any investigation of its effects.

I charge that without any inquiry as to the effect of this tax upon either the companies or the men they employ, and upon the naked assumption, unsupported by any ascertained facts, the committee arbitrarily proposed to levy a burden upon this industry that in many instances will amount to a confiscation of the business.

Do the Members of this House realize the magnitude of this industry or its relation to the industrial and commercial welfare of America?

It is estimated by the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce that 1,500,000 automobiles were manufactured in 1916, valued at $810,000,000.

There are 450 manufacturers of automobiles located in 32 States, and 825 manufacturers of parts and accessories located in nearly every State.

There are 25,724 dealers and 23,686 garages dependent upon this industry. Fourteen companies employ 145,000 men. Figuring 300 men for each of the other companies, gives a total of 280,000 wage earners. To this should be added 350,000 employed in the manufacture of bodies, parts, and in supply plants.

The 25,724 automobile dealers will average six employees each; the 23,686 garages will average three employees each.

This gives us a grand total of 855,402 wage earners in this industry and those allied with it. We have no data showing what proportion of these men are married, but surely 2,000,000 would be a very conservative estimate of the number of men, women, and children in America who are dependent upon this industry.

And yet, my friends, in the face of the magnitude of this industry, it is classed in this bill with tennis racquets, golf balls, imitation jewelry, face powder, perfume, vaseline, and Lydia Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. [Applause.]

It is estimated by the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce that when we declared a state of war with Germany very few automobile manufacturers were making over 12 per cent on their turnover. The proposed tax of 5 per cent would take five-twelfths of their profits. Assuming, now, that the tax can not be passed on to the consumer—and I propose to leave that question for the last—it would amount to 41.6 per cent of the profits of the entire trade. It would be equivalent to a tax of 41.6 per cent of the entire net profits for 1916.

I know there are some who believe that this tax can be borne by this industry without injury. This is due to a mistaken idea as to the profits of the business. In considering the justice of this tax I ask you to distinguish a few individual manufacturers from the industry as a whole.

I ask you, for instance, to consider the Ford Motor Co. in a class by itself, for that is where it properly belongs. The Ford plant is to-day the marvel of the manufacturing world. It is the last word in efficiency. It makes a car within the reach of the average man and fears no competition from any quarter. With its 50 great assembling plants—and I wish you gentlemen would mark this statement—with its 50 great assembling plants scattered throughout the United States it can sell its car at the actual cost of production, defeat competition by the saving in freight rates alone, and declare its dividends upon the profit from manufacturing its parts. It manufactured last year 539,000 cars, and it is this immense volume of business that enables it to make enormous profits. Through it a half dozen men have become immensely rich. But would it be fair to judge the success of the entire business by the success of the Ford Motor Co.? And should the ability of this company to pay the proposed tax be accepted as proof that all manufacturers can do the same?

To illustrate the point by a few concrete examples. I submit to you, gentlemen, that there has been a great deal of misrepresentation—unintentional, no doubt—in considering this question. A great deal has been said not only to becloud the issue but to cast a prejudice upon the entire automobile industry. Now, what are the facts?

Take the Studebaker corporation. You have all heard of that. Upon a business of $23,600,000 with its principal model last year it earned 7½ per cent. You propose by this bill to take 5 per cent of their gross sales.

The Chalmers, another car of which you have heard, upon a gross business of $18,000,000, paid 2.1 per cent. By this bill you propose to snag 5 per cent of the gross sales of that business.

I am giving you, members of the committee, the facts in regard to this industry. The Overland, with the second largest production in America, ranking next to the Ford, on sales of $80,000,000 made a profit of 10 per cent.

The Hupmobile, the president of which was a former Member of this House—my predecessor here—upon car sales of $10,000,000 made 1.1 per cent.

You propose by this bill to step in and take 5 per cent of those gross sales. And yet men upon the floor of this House attempt to defend this wrong upon the ground that "we need the money."

Now, a few more. The Chandler Co., upon a business of $12,860,000, made 11⅞ per cent. The Winton Co., upon sales of $9,150,000, made 4⅞ per cent. You propose by this bill to take 5 per cent of their sales. The Saxon Co., upon sales of $15,000,000, made 8 per cent.

Now, my friends, this list could be multiplied, but I have not the time to do it. The Hudson Co., for instance, made 8 per cent on its gross sales of $28,000,000. The manufacture of automobiles is a hazardous business. The path of this industry is strewn with the wrecks of ruined fortunes, dismantled factories, and disappointed ambitions. Within five years 718 concerns have failed or gone out of business, and to-day places are advertised where parts can be obtained for 217 "orphan" cars—cars once manufactured but no longer on the market.

These facts may seem strange to men who talk glibly of the profits of the Ford Motor Co., but they are facts, nevertheless, and I have the lists here for any gentleman who may care to look at them. I am not pleading for a few manufacturers who can pay this tax and live. I am pleading for those who can not pay it and will die. I am not pleading for special privilege for any; I am pleading for even-handed justice for all. This tax, if imposed, would make it impossible to collect an excess-profits tax from the great majority of these manufacturers and largely curtail the personal income tax that would be paid by the individual shareholder. So far as the automobile industry is concerned, it would kill the goose that lays the golden egg by decreasing the revenue both from the excess-profit tax and the personal-income tax.

Comprehend, if you can, the character of what is being attempted in this paragraph of the bill. Other great manufacturers are called upon to pay 16 per cent of their profits above 8 per cent, while these automobile manufacturers are called upon to pay 41.6 per cent of all their profits. Is it possible that Members on this floor, upon the plea of patriotism, are going to stand for an injustice of this character? I doubt if in the entire history of our legislation you can find a perversion of the taxing power that even approximates this proposal in its flippant disregard of the plain principles of justice.

The American people are beginning to appreciate the stern realities of this war. They are prepared to pay their taxes, no matter how heavy they may be, but they will rebel against unjust, unfair, and discriminatory burdens. The automobile manufacturers wish to keep their plants running and their men employed, but they object to a tax that to many of them represents the difference between success and failure.

Now, let us analyze this bill for a moment. The packing houses, the greatest industry in America, are among those whom the Government protects against taxation up to 8 per cent of their profits, while the automobile industry is taxed without regard to its profits. Is it because the Beef Trust has been so magnanimous to the American people that it should be preferred? What is there in the history and the practices of that industrial pirate that should entitle it to greater consideration than is given the automobile industry? The great Steel Corporation is protected against taxation in this bill up to 8 per cent of its profits. What is there in the history and the practices of this octopus that entitles it to greater consideration than is given the automobile industry? Are those who have ruthlessly destroyed competition by methods everywhere condemned to be protected by this Government, and the men who have preserved the principle of competition to be penalized in a country that proclaims the ideals of democracy?

It is sought to justify this tax upon the theory that the automobile is a luxury. The automobile is no longer a luxury in America. It is absolutely essential to the conduct of business and of industry. The Census Bureau reports that the production of business vehicles has grown rapidly from census to census, and that many passenger vehicles have been converted to business uses by their purchasers. The report also shows that the greatest proportional increase in both number and value of vehicles is of trucks, of which the output in 1914 was four times as great in number and eleven times as great in value as in 1909.

The other day you and I voted to authorize the purchase of four or five thousand automobiles for this war. Yet, my friends, this instrumentality of commerce, so vital to our industrial welfare, so essential to the Nation's business, and so indispensable to the successful prosecution of this great war, is classed by the Ways and Means Committee as a luxury.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. DOREMUS. I will yield first to the gentleman later.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Thank you.

Mr. DOREMUS. If the automobile is a luxury, why should the Ways and Means Committee permit 3,500,000 automobiles now in use to escape taxation entirely? By what sort of intellectual jugglery did this great committee reach the conclusion that the three and one-half million automobiles now in use are necessities, to be exempted from taxation, and those hereafter to be purchased are luxuries to be taxed?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman require more time?

Mr. DOREMUS. I should say so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield 15 additional minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields 15 additional minutes.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, the proposal to tax the automobile industry 5 per cent of its gross sales is grotesque, unjust, unscientific, unbusinesslike, and confiscatory, and can not even be defended from the standpoint of revenue. It will not yield the revenue estimated by the committee, because the estimate is based upon last year's production. That production will be seriously curtailed by the imposition of this burden and the conditions naturally incident to the war. Let me give you a few concrete illustrations to demonstrate the truth of what I am telling you.

The Packard Motor Co. last year made 10,000 automobiles. This year it will make 6,000.

The Hudson Co. last year made 25,000 cars. It will be fortunate this year if it makes 20,000 cars.

The Chandler, an Ohio corporation, has arranged to decrease its production 20 per cent from its original plans.

The McFarlan, an Indiana company, reports 10 per cent of its employees laid off because of war conditions and that the proposed tax would mean a decrease of 50 per cent in its business.

The Davis, another Indiana company, states that its business has decreased 50 per cent since the declaration of war, and that it is now working full force one-half time.

The Chalmers Co., of Detroit, has arranged to decrease its output by 16 to 20 per cent.

The Haynes Co., of Indiana, will decrease its production 50 per cent and lay off a large number of men.

The Anderson, another Indiana company, will reduce its output 25 per cent this year, and is already laying off men.

The Apperson, another Indiana company, has laid off 20 per cent of its employees and planned to reduce its output this year by approximately 50 per cent.

The Stearns, an Ohio company, reports that its business has slowed up fully 50 per cent since the declaration of war, but it feels that this is only temporary. If the slump continues, the company expects to curtail its production fully 50 per cent.

The Allan, another Ohio company, reports a noticeable depression in trade and daily cancellation of orders by dealers.

The Kline Co., of Richmond, Va., reports that the present outlook indicates decreased production of 50 per cent this year and a present decrease in the number of men employed of 20 per cent.

The Sterling Motor Truck Co., of Milwaukee, has reduced its manufacturing schedule for this year by about 50 per cent.

The Mitchell, another Wisconsin company, states that if this tax goes into effect radical cuts every way will be necessary. Owing to increased cost of labor and materials, their products have been dangerously decreased already.

The Moon, a Missouri company, reports that their business is cut at least in half for the present year.

The Pierce-Arrow Co., of Buffalo, N. Y., reports that cancellations of passenger cars last month exceeded new orders by 40 per cent, and that it is arranging to decrease its production.

The Overland Co., of Toledo, Ohio, had 30,000 orders on its books April 1; it now has but 16,500.

There are a number of others, but my time will not permit me to refer to them. The list could be multiplied indefinitely. They indicate conclusively to my mind that the revenue expected from this tax can not be realized; that it will result in a large decrease of the excess profits tax, and the personal-income tax of those engaged in the business.

Now, this is all based upon the assumption that the tax can not be passed on to the consumer without curtailing production, and I think it can be conceded by every Member here that that is the crux of this whole proposition.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. DOREMUS. I will yield in just a few minutes. Can this tax be added to the purchase price without diminishing the production of automobiles? The profits of the automobile industry are made possible only by the large volume of sales, and it is impossible to advance prices on a falling market occasioned by a decreased demand.

I desire now to call your attention to some of the increased prices of materials which manufacturers are obliged to buy.

For the purpose of this illustration I am going to take the Chevrolet car. The shipping weight of this car is 1,625 pounds.

Frame steel (chassis, 120 pounds to make a frame): Eighteen months ago cost $1.35 per hundred pounds; present price, $5.25 per hundred pounds. Increase, 270 per cent.

Body and fender steel (250 pounds per car): Eighteen months ago cost $2.75 per hundred pounds; present price, $8.15 per hundred pounds. Increase, 196 per cent.

Stove-pipe iron (used for making mud-pans, mufflers, etc.): Eighteen months ago cost $1.85 per hundred pounds; present price, $5.75 per hundred pounds. Increase, 200 per cent.

Cast iron (standard northern pig iron, 370 pounds per car): Eighteen months ago cost $13.35 per ton; present price, $43 per ton. Increase, 222 per cent.

Malleable iron (used for transmission cases, motors, and rear axle parts. 130 pounds per car): Eighteen months ago cost $3.90 per hundred pounds; price January 1, 1917, $6.75 per hundred pounds. Increase, 70 per cent.

Forging billets (used in front axle forging and other plain forging, 135 pounds per car): Eighteen months ago cost $40 per ton; present price, $105 per ton. Increase, 162½ per cent.

Brass and copper (radiator and carbureter and electric equipment): Eighteen months ago cost 16½ cents per pound; present price, 38 cents per pound. Increase, 130 per cent.

Rubber tires: Increase, 50 per cent.

And so I might go on and take up every part of this car and show that the increases run all the way from 50 per cent to over 300 per cent.

But I must pass on. By reason of these rapid advances in the price of materials, many of the manufacturers have already been obliged to increase their price to the public. The price of the Hudson car has been advanced twice during the past year and a half. The Packard Motor Co., which attempted two years ago to place a car on the market for $2,600, is now selling the same car for $3,050. It has been obliged to increase the price because of the rapid advances in the cost of all these materials.

As previously pointed out, both of these companies will decrease their output this year. Now, I submit to you in all fairness it ought to appeal to the business judgment of every Member here that under present conditions the increased price of materials and the decreasing demand for cars, both occurring at the same time, will make it impossible for these men to pass this tax on to the consumer without decreasing their production.

It has been suggested in the course of this debate that the retail dealers are making a whole lot of money and that they could easily share a part of this tax. I am afraid, my friends, that during the entire progress of this debate there has been too much conjecture and too much guesswork, and I fear that that charge can also be made against the Committee on Ways and Means in the preparation of the bill.

Now, what about the local dealer, the retail man?

I desire to quote from the sworn testimony of Norvell A. Hawkins, sales manager of the Ford Motor Co., in the case of The Ford Co. against The Union Motor Sales Co.:

> A dealer to have a successful business must incur expense. I would say 10 per cent of the selling price of the car would be their minimum. * * * A garage man can not run his business for less than 10 per cent. * * * He has to teach possibly every member of the man's family to drive the car. * * * He has the adjustments of the car. * * * There is a whole lot of gratuitous work, which all comes out of their profits. That service can not be maintained at our price, could not be maintained by a dealer in furnishing garage and service. It is required that our dealers each must have a demonstrating car. * * * He has that expense and he must maintain a place of business, salesmen, and do suitable advertising. * * * The service given by our agents and dealers to the purchasers, after the sale of the car, is the largest factor of our business. In that respect the automobile business differs from any other that I know of, and I would say that most of the failures in the automobile business could be attributed to lack of service; that is, lack of their sales department to continue service to the owners after the sales.

Mr. DICKINSON. May I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. DOREMUS. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will yield to him in a few minutes. Now, let us figure out the profits of a Ford dealer who sells 100 cars a year. He is what is known in the trade as an average dealer. The Ford Co. sells its cars to its agent or dealer at 15 per cent off the list price.

For these 100 cars he pays the following prices:

60 touring cars, at $306	$18,360.00
30 roadsters, at $293.25	8,797.50
10 chassis, at $276.25	2,762.50
Total purchases	29,920.00
SALES.
60 touring cars, at $360	21,600.00
30 roadsters, at $345	10,350.00
10 chassis, at $325	3,250.00
Total sales	35,200.00
10 per cent for doing business	3,520.00
	31,680.00
Total purchases	29,920.00
Profit on year's business	1,760.00

I think, although I am not positive about it, that when an agent buys 100 cars he gets a slight additional discount over the 15 per cent. I have not those exact figures, but I will say in that connection that the man who transacts this volume of business must have a cash capital of at least $10,000, and he is entitled to earn 6 per cent on that.

If I had the time, I could pursue the inquiry further with other companies—the Chevrolet, for instance—which pays about the same.

Now, the average discount from the list price of these small automobiles is from 15 to 20 per cent. On the Hudson, the Packard, and the Cadillac it runs between 20 and 25 per cent, and of all the cars sold in this country the discount from the list price on 60 per cent of the entire output is less than 18 per cent.

I desire now to call attention to the advertising argument. The gentleman from North Carolina flashed a copy of the Saturday Evening Post here the other day, as I understand, for the purpose of showing that the automobile industry spends too much money for advertising. There are some advertisers in this magazine to which he did not call attention. On the back of this publication I find the Eastman Kodak Co. with a $5,000 space. Kodaks pay on their excess profits.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will yield, kodaks pay just the same as automobiles.

Mr. DOREMUS. I am glad the gentleman has stated that, for I did not know it. Well, here are "Sunkist oranges," what do they pay? They pay on excess profits. They have a $5,000 space there. Here is a page for Sherwin & Williams paint; on what do they pay? On their excess profits, and they have a $5,000 space.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. And I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. DOREMUS. I have here a statement taken from the Martin's Merchandising Reporting Service, of May 15, showing the percentage of sales spent by prominent advertisers of America for advertising:

	Per cent.
Arrow collars	3½
Cloth-craft clothes	1½
Colgate's preparations	2
Fatima cigarettes	5
Ivory soap	3
Kodaks	3
Old Dutch cleanser	10
Phonographs	5
Sears-Roebuck & Co	10
Sherwin-Williams paint	3½
Universal Portland cement	2
Velvet tobacco	6
Wooltex clothes	2

The percentage of sales in the automobile industry that goes into advertising does not exceed 2 per cent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOREMUS. Just a moment, and then I will answer the gentleman. I have some telegrams received here from the presidents of automobile companies. They are as follows:

During last year our expenditures for advertising equaled 1.1 per cent of our net sales.

ALVAN MACAULEY,
President Packard Motor Co.

Cadillac Co.'s expenditure for advertising during past several years was less than three-quarters of 1 per cent of gross sales.

W. C. LELAND,
Secretary Cadillac Motor Car Co.

Advertising expenditure 2.6 per cent of total sales.

H. W. FORD,
President Saxon Motor Car Co.

One and three-tenths per cent.

ROY D. CHAPIN,
President Hudson Motor Car Co.

Now why is it that our manufacturers of automobiles advertise in papers like these. It is because the competition in the automobile business is keen and they are obliged to do it in order to get their share of the trade. I do not know what the condition is down in the district represented by my friend from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. It is possible that they still cling to the old notion that it does not pay to advertise, but, my friends, we have gotten over that notion up where I reside. [Laughter.]

For the first time during my experience here, and I hope for the last time, I have heard men plead with us to do something that they themselves concede is wrong. I never expected to reach the time when Members of the House would not only vote for but openly advocate an unjust thing in the name of patriotism.

Patriotism, my friends, needs no such advocates. Patriotism thrives only when its seed is sown in the soil of justice.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] admitted that the automobile paragraph of this bill is wrong, and could only be defended upon the ground that we need the money. Yet, in an elaborate presentation of figures he demonstrated that this bill will yield $200,000,000 more than the administration asks us to raise. The plea that we need the money will not suffice for an abuse of the taxing power. No exigency, however great, would justify the Congress in the commission of an acknowledged wrong against any portion of our people. If we can not prosecute this war without knowingly wronging our own people, we had better abandon it. [Applause.] If we are prosecuting this war for democracy, then, in its conduct, let us preserve the principles of democracy. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have presented this case based upon facts which I have ascertained and know to be true. If the evil consequences, which I fear, shall come to pass, the responsibility for this legislation will be yours and not mine.

I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's figures were quite astounding in reference to the percentages being paid in profits. I assume the figures are based upon the capital stock?

Mr. DOREMUS. No; they are all computed upon the basis of the gross output, because that is what it is proposed to levy the tax upon—5 per cent of the gross output.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Then the profits are not upon the capital stock, but upon the total sales?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And the tax is on the gross sales also?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes; that is why the computation is made upon the basis of the gross sales.

Mr. MADDEN. And under this bill they would not be allowed to charge any part of this gross tax up against the expense of manufacturing the car?

Mr. DOREMUS. Not at all.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman a question about the advertising cost, but I ask it purely for information, because I regard the gentleman as the authority upon this question in the House. I do not know whether I understood the gentleman correctly when he said he was referring to the percentage of the gross sales of the car. I remember I made a statement yesterday, to which the gentleman took exception, when I was basing an estimate, a rough estimate, of the cost of advertising on the cost of the car, not on the gross sales. I want to ask the gentleman if he can tell us how much the Packard Co. pays for advertising in a year? He has referred to the Packard Co.

Mr. DOREMUS. The gentleman means the total amount?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. DOREMUS. No. I can give you the percentage, but I can also give you their gross sales, and you can figure it from that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not want the gross business; I want the actual amount expended.

Mr. DOREMUS. I can not give you the actual amount expended. I can give you the percentage of their total sales that went into advertising, and the computation is made upon that basis because it is proposed to levy a tax upon the gross sales. I can not give you the total amount that they expended.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As near as possible, what was the amount?

Mr. DOREMUS. I would not attempt to guess at it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What was the amount of the gross sales?

Mr. DOREMUS. I think $35,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And what percentage of the gross sales was the advertising cost to the Packard Co.?

Mr. DOREMUS. One and one-tenth per cent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That would be a little over $300,000?

Mr. DOREMUS. Approximately.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is that all they expended for advertising?

Mr. DOREMUS. That is what they telegraphed me this morning, and I have absolutely no doubt that they are telling the exact truth about it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am asking for information, because the figures are rather astounding.

Mr. DOREMUS. I have absolutely no doubt that the telegram states the exact truth. The trouble with the gentleman from Ohio is this. He admitted yesterday that his estimate was a pure guess. I am giving you the facts taken from the books of these corporations.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am simply seeking information, and I will ask if the gentleman can furnish me with the total amount paid for advertising?

Mr. DOREMUS. The gentleman means by the Packard Co.?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes. I speak of the Packard Co. because I own a Packard car and the gentleman has referred to the Packard Co.

Mr. DOREMUS. I think a lot of the gentleman from Ohio and I want to accommodate him, and as soon as I get back to my office I shall send a telegram to the Packard Co. and get the total amount they expended for advertising.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, does my colleague know what the net increase on material is over last year?

Mr. DOREMUS. I have only the increase for the last year and a half.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In corroboration of the gentleman's statement, and to supplement it, I want to state what I found out about two automobile factories in my district. The figures are much like what the gentleman has given. One of them is the Moline Auto Co. They make about a thousand cars which they sell for $1,200 each. Their profits on sales last year were 7 per cent. They have already contracted three-fourths of their output for this year. The other company is the Velie Automobile Co. They made 7.4 per cent net last year, and they told me, and I know it is absolutely true, that their sales last month fell off 30 per cent, and they have already reduced their working force 30 per cent.

Mr. DOREMUS. I have no doubt that that is true. I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON] wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOREMUS. I will.

Mr. DICKINSON. I want to ask whether the gentleman can give the committee an estimate or an accurate statement as to the amount of salaries paid by these respective companies that tend to reduce their income?

Mr. DOREMUS. I have not those figures at hand, but the gentleman will find in the census report of 1914 just exactly what was paid in salaries up to that time. I do not think there is any later information that is now available.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOREMUS. I will.

Mr. HARDY. It seems to me the great point of this case is to be determined perhaps largely by the question of whether the automobile is a luxury or a necessity. Can the gentleman give anything like the percentage of the automobile industry that is devoted to useful trade and that which is devoted to what he might call "joy riding"?

Mr. DOREMUS. I think I know what my friend from Texas refers to. I can give nothing except what I read from the census report, which shows the wonderful increase in the number of business vehicles as compared with passenger vehicles.

Mr. HARDY. About what per cent of this industry is devoted to the production of what might be termed useful vehicles?

Mr. DOREMUS. I have not figured that out.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. DOREMUS. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman tell the committee how many concerns are engaged in the manufacture of automobiles, approximately?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes; there are 450 automobile manufacturers in the United States. Of that number 12 of them do 80 per cent of the business, the remaining 438 do the balance of the business.

Mr. MADDEN. And is it the general understanding that most of those automobile concerns do not make any money?

Mr. DOREMUS. Outside of the Ford and one or two others it is very doubtful if any manufacturer to-day makes in excess of 12 per cent upon his turnover, and a great majority of them make much less.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended two minutes to enable him to answer a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield two minutes.

Mr. HILL. I want to ask the gentleman whether he has proposed any alternative plan for raising this $80,000,000 that is taxed now in the bill against automobiles, tires, and tubes?

Mr. DOREMUS. I am very glad my friend from Connecticut asks that question because it has a vital bearing upon this whole matter. I wish that the Ways and Means Committee had adopted the suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury and levied a license tax upon every automobile in America. That would have been a just tax, and I believe that 99 per cent of the owners of automobiles in this country would be glad to pay it, thus "doing their bit" to carry on this great war. Now, I will suggest another way: This bill is expected to raise—I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Connecticut who has asked me the question—this bill proposes to raise $200,000,000 by a 16 per cent tax upon excess profits. You can get $50,000,000 more by making that 20 per cent, and I do not think it would hurt anybody. [Applause.] If you want more you can get it by increasing the tax on these big incomes.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOREMUS. I will.

Mr. PLATT. Have not a large number of the automobile factories had war orders? And is it not likely that, if the business falls off on account of this tax, they will take war orders to make up more than the business they should lose?

Mr. DOREMUS. I would not like to attempt to look into the future and say that the business which will be lost by this bill will be absorbed in some other industry. I would not want to risk my reputation as a prophet by saying that the men who will be thrown out of work by this bill can find employment elsewhere. If they are thrown out of work, I sincerely hope they can find employment elsewhere, but I doubt it very much.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GORDON. Give the gentleman time enough to answer one question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. GORDON. I understood the gentleman to say that if we can not prosecute this war without abandoning the prinples of democracy that we had better abandon the war?

Mr. DOREMUS. I will tell you what I said. I said if we could not prosecute this war without committing an acknowledged wrong against the American people, we had better abandon it.

Mr. GORDON. I want to ask the gentleman whether or not the military conscription of the bodies of our young men to prosecute this war is not an acknowledged wrong?

Mr. DOREMUS. That is not an acknowledged wrong; it is an acknowledged right—acknowledged by 90 per cent of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. It would be still more right if we stuck to the 19 to 20 years, I suppose, instead of the 19 to 30?

Mr. DOREMUS. I agree with you that the minimum age should be 21 years.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I had not intended to say one word during this debate, but it was my purpose to content myself with voting for the bill, but the debate has taken such a range that I can not refrain from saying a few words. The membership of this House, whether the business men of this country do or not, know that this country is at war, and that we must have money to successfully prosecute it. Not a member of the Committee on Ways and Means derived any pleasure in placing upon the people of this country any additional tax burden. We would have preferred not to have levied taxes on anyone, but as we were at war we had to have large additional revenues. The committee thought, considering everything, the bill brought before the House for your consideration is an equitable one. Now, I believe in paying tribute to whom tribute is due and honor to whom honor is due, and that really is what impels me to appear before you for a few moments.

My friend, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], said that Mr. Ford occupied a unique position in the automobile world. I agree to that. Gentlemen of the committee, he also occupies a unique position in the business world, for Henry Ford, who will pay more taxes to the Government under this bill than any other six automobile manufacturers in the country combined, is the only business man in the country who will contribute largely to the Government under this tax bill that has not flooded the Ways and Means Committee with telegrams protesting against additional taxation. [Applause.]

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. No; I will not.

Not a member of the Ways and Means Committee, so far as I have been able to ascertain, and I have talked with many of them, has received a single telegram from Henry Ford or a Henry Ford agent, protesting against this taxation.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. No; I will not yield now to the gentleman. I have only five minutes.

In addition to that, Mr. Ford occupies another unique distinction. He is the only manufacturer in the country who pays every man in his employment at least $5 a day. He is a true philanthropist. A great many of the gentlemen that telegraphed and wrote me urging to vote to conscript the boys, favoring conscripting only boys between the ages of 19 and 21 to do all the fighting, are now the ones who are wiring me, "We are willing to do our part, but do not want to pay any more taxes." [Applause.] They do not want to fight; they do not want to pay, but want to pose as patriots.

I feel, fellow Members, that when you conscript the life and blood of the boys that there is no harm done if you make the wealth of the country pay its just and equitable part of the burdens of this war. [Applause.]

Mr. Henry Ford opposed war. I do not know him. I never saw him or had any communication with him in my life, but he spent his money trying to prevent the preparedness program of the administration, believing it best for his country, and he sincerely tried to keep the country out of war; but when the war was declared, as a brave, patriotic, American business man, he tendered to this Government his vast plant to use as it saw fit, and, in addition to that, although he will pay to the Government more taxes than almost all the other automobile plants put together, not a protest has come from him or any of his agents. I felt that he was thus entitled to be held up to the American public as a business man of whom we have a right to be proud. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, on the 14th day of April, without a dissenting vote, this body passed an act which provided for the issuance of five billion worth of bonds and two billions in certificates with which to prosecute the war with Germany. At that time the people were generally given to understand that the major portion of that load was to be placed upon the shoulders of those best able to bear the burden.

Shortly after war was declared the board of directors of the St. Paul Association of Public and Business Affairs, an organization comprising 5,000 of the leading business and professional men of that enterprising city, met and adopted the following resolution, with one dissenting vote:

Whereas many hundreds of thousands of American citizens are to be called upon for the supreme patriotic sacrifice, pledging their lives for their country; and

Whereas the least that those remaining at home can do in any measure even approaching this sacrifice of those on the firing line is to pledge their entire financial resources: Therefore be it

Resolved, That in behalf of this association of nearly 5,000 St. Paul business and professional men we urge upon the Government conscription of dollars as well as of men, to be brought about through the imposition of large graduated income taxes, reaching the total absorption for all incomes over $100,000 a year.

We all realize that this war will call for unusual sacrifices on the part of everyone, but these sacrifices should be equitably apportioned. The burden should not fall upon any individual in such a manner as to create an actual hardship, yet that is precisely what this measure proposes. It would place an irksome load upon the poor, who are already taxed to the breaking point, and also upon industries which are now operating at or above income.

Permit me to take for an example the proposed increase in second-class postage rates. First, it proposes to place a duty of 10 per cent on import of print paper; and as if this were not sufficient to drive the publishers out of business it would increase the postage rates on second-class matter from 100 to 500 per cent. I fear that the committee was working in the dark when it drafted that particular section, for, knowing the members of the committee as I do, I feel confident that they would not intentionally bring into this Chamber a measure that will drive thousands of necessary publications into bankruptcy; yet that is precisely what it will do.

It is estimated that this advance in second-class postage rates will bring into the coffers of the Government an additional $19,000,000. Let me assure the committee that such an income would not prove permanent. It should require no great financial genius to see that the $19,000,000 which it is proposed to raise through the application of the zone system would in other ways add an additional burden to an already sorely tried industry. Such an income can not be reckoned on present basis of circulation, for that would inevitably contract and cause a loss in revenue; furthermore, the loss in revenue might be much greater than the additional amount you now propose to raise. Nearly $100,000,000 is expended annually for advertising in this country. This advertising brings the Post Office Department a large business in first-class matter, and should Congress ill-advisedly increase second-class postage rates, as proposed by the Ways and Means Committee, there would be an enormous loss in sale of stamps and the Government would thus be the loser by a system of taxation that practically amounts to confiscation. The publishers of the country protest against the plan of this new revenue bill because it seeks to impose excessive and destructive taxes upon established business, which derives no increased profits from war conditions, but which has already been severely punished by greatly increased cost of production due to existing conditions. War thus creates new and abnormal profits for certain classes of industries. These profits, which are in excess of the normal and average profits earned prior to the war, should properly and equitably pay the cost of the war which creates them.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KNUTSON. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. Will it not be the case that when you take away this unfair right of big centers to send their literature across the continent practically for nothing, that it will tend to build up the local publications and help the little publications of the country?

Mr. KNUTSON. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that there are a large number of scientific, religious, educational, and trade journals published in this country that are necessarily published in the large centers of population. Neither in your section of the country nor in my section of the country could we properly support some of these publications, because the contributors are highly paid men and women, and their circulation is necessarily restricted.

Mr. HARDY. Is not the general effect of this uniform postage rate to destroy the haul of local publications and to concentrate the publication in the big centers?

Mr. KNUTSON. Do you mean under the zone system?

Mr. HARDY. No; under the uniform postage rate.

Mr. KNUTSON. No; I think not. I think the Post Office Department has erred in not shutting out from the mails the purely mail-order publications. Otherwise I do not think it has affected the condition of the smaller dailies or the weeklies at all.

England has found by experience that war profits should pay war taxes, and the bill now before us for consideration makes no effort whatever to tax war profits as distinguished from general profits in industry. The increased postal rates proposed for remote zones are prohibitive and will result in limiting the circulation of newspapers to the first two zones of approximately 150 miles from the point of publication.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BORLAND. Would the gentleman support an amendment which would retain the rate of 1 cent a pound on exclusively reading matter, and put a parcel-post rate on the weight devoted to advertising matter?

Mr. KNUTSON. I will say to the gentleman that most of the publications of this country are operating at about cost at the present time, and many of them at below cost, and if you go to work and penalize advertizing you are going to arrive at the same goal that this bill proposes to take us to, and I would not permit myself to tax advertising.

Mr. BORLAND. Is the gentleman advocating that the Government ought to carry an unlimited amount of paid advertising space at a loss?

Mr. KNUTSON. I will admit that after the advertising reaches a certain aggregate it becomes an advertising paper rather than a newspaper or a periodical disseminating information and news.

Mr. BORLAND. There is no limit on the advertising space a publisher may add to his publications.

Mr. KNUTSON. Would not the gentleman think that could be regulated by the Post Office Department rather than by Congress?

Mr. BORLAND. If it has authority. I am perfectly willing to give it the authority, and I am asking the gentleman if he is willing to do so.

Mr. KNUTSON. I am perfectly willing. I am pleading in behalf of newspapers and periodicals that disseminate information.

Mr. BORLAND. I think I see the gentleman's point. We both agree that the dissemination of information and intelligence is desirable.

Mr. KNUTSON. I do not want to tax education, and that is what this bill proposes to do.

This is unwise public policy for the reason that we need in these times a strong nationalism. The successful prosecution of this war and the welfare of the country in the future demand that our people be enabled through the wide circulation of newspapers and periodicals to familiarize themselves with the thought and progress of all parts of their common country. From my experience of many years in the publishing business I am convinced that such prohibitive rates as are proposed in this bill will destroy many publications whose publishers are unable to pass their tax on to the public, and that the tonnage thus driven from the mails will result in a net loss of postal revenue to the Government, and thus destroy at one blow the very object of this new taxation. You not alone propose to pick the fruit, but with one mighty swing of the ax you would cut down the tree that bears the fruit. The publishers will not object to your helping yourself to the fruit, but they object most strenuously to your cutting down the tree and that is practically what this bill proposes.

There is not an industry in the country to-day that is so heavily burdened as is the printing and publishing business. It is absolutely without protection, yet pays the highest salaries and sells for the lowest possible price. Of all lines of human endeavor it is from the very nature of its composition the least able to adjust itself to changing conditions. Other industries can and do "pass the buck" to the ultimate consumer, but this the publishers can not do without sacrificing a large share of their business.

Several years ago one of the large dailies in the Northwest increased its subscription price on mailed papers from $4.80 to $6 per year, and within 18 months its subscription list dwindled 25,000, and the publisher sustained a loss that compelled him to sell his business at a tremendous sacrifice. The new owners immediately lowered the price to the old rate and it has taken them nearly four years to bring the subscription list back to the old figures.

Within the past few days I have received a number of communications protesting against the passage of the proposed advance in second-class postage rates, and I will ask that several of them be inserted in the RECORD. Every one of these letters has come from publishers who are issuing publications that are vitally necessary to the welfare of the people and the Nation. They all declare that they are operating on a very narrow margin of profit or at a positive loss, but without exception they all express a willingness to pay an income tax on their profits up to 100 per cent providing other industries are taxed in a like manner.

You must remember, my friends, that all taxation should be based upon justice. Justice in taxation does not necessarily mean equality in the amount paid, but rather equality in the effect of the tax upon the actual conditions of the life of the people who pay it. A tax of $10 may be a greater burden upon the poor man, when by paying such tax he is compelled to forego many necessities and all luxuries, than would a tax of thousands be upon the wealthy man.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], in his speech on Saturday—which, by the way, was replete with wit and sarcasm but rather deficient in logic—took for his text the utterly worthless publications which make Augusta, Me., famous, and in so doing bunched all the publications of the Nation together, regardless of their merit and the work in which they are engaged. If the gentleman from Illinois will bring in a bill that will exclude these worse than worthless publications from the mails altogether, I will gladly support such a measure. However, I do not propose to throw away good wheat because there may be a little chaff mixed with it. Rather, I would run such wheat through a fanning mill and separate the wheat from the chaff. In extenuation of the proposed raise in postage rates the gentleman from Illinois suggested that the publishers raise their price to the public; in other words, "Pass the buck to the consumer." Ah, Mr. Chairman, that is a good Democratic doctrine, and one that no doubt enabled you to raise your large war chest last fall with which you carried on your propaganda of "peace and prosperity." [Applause.]

I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that the ultimate consumer has just about all that he can do to make both ends meet under Democratic prosperity. Permit me to read you a few figures that will give an excellent idea of the doubtful prosperity under which we are living.

Between April 1, 1914, and April 1, 1917, dairy and garden products increased 84 per cent; meat, 46 per cent; clothing, 49 per cent; metals, 69 per cent; and foodstuffs, 105 per cent.

Yet wages have not anywhere near kept up with the unprecedented increase in cost of living.

An old Irish friend of mine recently wrote me, "If God will forgive me, I'll never vote the Democratic ticket again." To which I replied, "If necessities of life continue to advance, you'll not live to have the chance." [Laughter.]

Following the food riots in New York Miss Helen M. Todd was appointed to make an investigation of the effect on school children of the high cost of food. She reported last week that in the poorer districts diet has been so cut down that the children's scholarship has suffered materially through malnutrition, and that public-school teachers complain that the children are unable to maintain their grades.

No, Mr. Chairman, the publishers can not make further increases in cost to their patrons. To do so would be suicidal. They are between the devil and the deep blue sea. To make matters worse for the small publishers, they have had to meet the competition of the Government printed envelope, which is being put out at an actual loss, and which is made up from postal receipts. The Government is furnishing printed envelopes at less than the printer can buy the plain envelope for.

In this morning's mail I received a letter from a publisher in my district which stated that the Government is selling No. 5 envelopes with business card printed thereon at $21.60 per thousand. The same envelopes cost the printer about $1.65. Uncle Sam will furnish No. 8 envelopes for $22.56 per thousand, with business card printed thereon, and the same envelope costs the printer $3.80 per thousand. The postmaster acts as solicitor. In so doing he is obeying orders of the Post Office Department. This form of competition means the loss of millions of dollars to the small country printer, who does not have the Government exchequer upon which to fall back. In justice to the gentlemen on that side of the House, I will state that this reprehensible and indefensible method has been in vogue for many years and may have been instituted by a Republican administration for all that I know.

Gentlemen, in closing I beg of you to consider well before you pass the provision which will raise the second-class postage rates. Do not, I implore you, do that which will drive thousands of publishers to the wall. Remember that a free press is the greatest single agency for good in existence. Bear in mind that it is the greatest protection of democracy ever devised by man. The American press is performing an invaluable public service in helping to popularize the "liberty loan," and it made possible the enactment of the necessary war legislation. Our press will protect the welfare of the boys at the front and buoy them up in their hours of doubt and stress. It will stimulate their patriotism and courage and cheer the old folks at home. I wish to read the following:

FREE READING FOR CAMPS—PUBLISHERS UNITE IN MOVEMENT TO KEEP THE SOLDIERS SUPPLIED.

Some of the leading publishers of the country have formed the Publishers' Camp Library Committee, to supply free books and magazines for the soldiers in their spare hours. Robert J. Shores, of 225 Fifth Avenue, who is chairman of the committee, said yesterday:

"The young soldier needs reading matter, and by it he will be made a better soldier. We American publishers should thereby supply him with it in a more thorough manner and with a more generous hand than those of any other country or Government. We do not ask a cent. We give the books, pay the freight or expressage to the American Red Cross, Bush Terminal, Brooklyn, and they there distribute them to the soldiers. The same principle applies to magazines. Any person who has a large or small number of books he desires to dispose of free may do the same thing. We are in hopes that our plan may also be extended to the Navy, where, I am told, the new ships have not been provided with the small library which would be so useful to all the men."

With Mr. Shores are Doubleday, Page & Co.; Little, Brown & Co.; Edward J. Clode, Mitchell Kennerley, Alfred A. Knopf, Curtis Publishing Co., the Illustrated Sunday Magazine, the Motion Picture Magazine, the Pictorial Review, Health Culture Magazine, the Penn Publishing Co., and others.

Please bear in mind the great work that the agricultural papers have done and are doing to increase the production and conservation of foods. The publicity given by the American press to all vital economic problems now confronting the Nation can not be paid with money, and we must not reward them with the kiss of a Judas. [Applause.]

PROPOSED POSTAL RATES AS APPLIED TO MINNEAPOLIS JOURNAL.

In the West circulation of metropolitan papers extend great distances west. A careful analysis of the Journal's subscription list shows that the average rate which we would pay under proposed schedule would be 2¾ cents per pound. In 1916 we paid $64,000 newspaper postage on a 1-cent basis. Under new basis we would pay $176,000, an increase of $113,000. Our print paper will cost us $215,000 more than last year, regardless of the fact that the most drastic economies have been introduced, such as reduced volume of reading, elimination of all waste, exchanges, free copies, etc.

In addition a 10 per cent import duty is suggested, which would add $54,000 more. The increased cost of all commodities entering into the business, including labor, ink, metal, etc., are easily $100,000 more, a total of practically $500,000 increased cost all told.

We are in favor of the Government taking such part of our profits as are necessary, but can not see the wisdom of wholly destroying the business, leaving us absolutely no opportunity to pay even a normal income tax. We estimate that the increased postage per subscriber under the proposed schedule would average over $4 per year, which would necessitate doubling our present subscription price, a figure that would not only reduce country circulation but absolutely destroy it. In 1907 the Journal increased its subscription price from $4.80 per year daily and Sunday to $6. Regardless of the fact that we gave all subscribers 60 days to renew at the old price, with 25 men on the road to talk our cause, we lost 25 per cent of our country circulation in less than 12 months, and were obliged to restore the $4.80 price to stop further shrinkage.

GOMPERS'S APPEAL TO FIGHT HIGH TAX ON PRINTED MATTER.

To all organized labor, greeting:

Since our Nation has become involved actively in the gigantic struggle for the world's democracy, new tests and problems must be met and solved. What has made our progress so notable in the past has been the indomitable spirit, thrift, and sense of sacrifice of the men and women of labor for the ultimate greatness of the American labor movement.

Underlying all of our achievements has been the unrestricted right to a free press, unhampered by unwarranted restrictions, and not unduly burdened by excessive taxation in any form. The American Federation of Labor has always protested against unwarranted restrictions upon a free press and will continue protesting until every court and judge in our land will fully observe this great fundamental right and guarantee of liberty of a free people.

Within the past few days a new menace has presented itself to the free press of our country in the legislative proposal to tax unduly printed matter coming under the rules of second-class postage. Under guise of war-revenue measure it is not only proposed to increase the postage rate of second-class matter from 1 to 2 cents a pound, but it is also intended to apply a zone system (district rates), thereby practically increasing the cost of carrying printed matter from 1 cent per pound to 6 cents per pound. No such exorbitant rate as this exists for any class of matter for the longest world's routes, even in war times. Such a tax is strictly prohibitive. It spells disaster and ruin to the labor press of our country and will seriously hamper and retard that part of the public press sympathetic to the appeals and needs of the labor movement. This proposed increase of postage rates on second-class mail matter can only benefit those publications supported and financed by and in the interest of large and gigantic combinations of wealth, and it will destroy those publications barely eking out an existence because of their desire and determination to serve the great mass of our people, working men and women of our country.

The public press, like every other individual, concern, or institution, should be required to pay its just proportion of war taxes. This, however, should be done by increasing the income and inheritance taxes, a tax upon profits and upon land values.

To place a double and triple tax upon the public press is without warrant and excuse and simply means that many publications will be forced out of existence. Such a condition will seriously menace the conditions of life and work of the men and women employed in the printing and closely related and kindred trades by throwing thousands of them out of employment. Shall we sit idly by while the very livelihood of thousands of our fellow workers is placed in jeopardy and while the labor and sympathetic public press is seriously menaced? Can we afford to permit that part of the public press financed by and in the interest of large and wealthy combinations of men to control exclusively the means of information and thereby dominate the minds of the people of our country?

Profits and incomes should be taxed, but the very source of employment of our fellow workers and the maintenance of a liberal and free press should remain unimpaired.

An immediate protest against this proposed increase in postage rates on second-class matter and against the application of the zone system should be immediately directed to every Congressman and Senator. Every central labor union, State federation of labor, and all affiliated unions should immediately voice their protest against this menacing proposal. Action to be effective must be at once. Respond to this appeal without delay. Act now!

Fraternally, yours,

SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

LITTLE FALLS, MINN., May 8, 1917.

Hon. HAROLD KNUTSON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We certainly have been hard hit, especially we of the small-daily game. For instance, before the war we were buying print paper at 2½ cents per pound f. o. b. our office; now we are paying 6 cents per pound. We use three tons and over each month, which means an increased cost to us on print paper alone of $200 per month.

We have made no money in the last year on account of this, but have been able to hold our own. If present conditions continue, however, we are going to lose some money this year.

In order to show you the difference in cost of production in 1913 and now, we are giving you the comparison below in detail form:

	1913	Now.
Print paper, per pound	$0.02½	$0.06
Newsink, per pound	.05	.10
Hard inks, per pound	2.00	4.00
Bookkeeper, per month	60.00	80.00
Foreman, per week	20.00	24.00
Ad men, per week	15.00	18.00
Make-up men, per week	14.00	17.00
Linotype operator, per week	15.00	18.00
Press feeders, errand boys, per week, each	4.50	6.00
Reporters, per week	14.00	16.00

If the postage is raised 200 per cent, as is proposed, it will mean another increased cost to us of $30 per month. It will also mean the suspension of several small dailies throughout the country.

Thanking you in advance for anything you can do for us in this matter, we are,

Very truly, yours,

Hon. HAROLD KNUTSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: As to the raise in cost of running a newspaper, I have not figured much on the per cent, but have increased my prices for advertising and job work to overcome the difference. Print paper has gone up from $2.40 to $6 per hundred pounds; type metal, from 8 cents to 14 cents per pound; inks, from 100 to 500 per cent; type, about 50 per cent; labor in my office, about 20 per cent. Things are quite different from what they were two years ago. Bond and flat papers have gone up more than 100 per cent.

I have noticed your opposition to the increased postage rate, and you may be sure the boys will appreciate anything that you can do for them in this direction, not that they want to shirk any part of their responsibility or obligations in the strife, but the margin of profit in the country printing office is very close at the present time. If I break even this year I will consider myself fortunate.

Yours, truly,

J. D. HARADON.

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR HAROLD: It surely would be rank injustice to the newspaper men of the country should Congress see fit to double the amount now paid for newspaper postage.

During the past year the cost of producing a newspaper, as shown by our office records, has increased about 40 per cent.

Of this increase we find that paper has advanced 200 per cent, jumping from $2.50 per hundred pounds to $6.50; ink, from 5 cents a pound to 11 cents.

The wages paid have increased to meet the high cost of living by about 33⅓ per cent, and often more. We formerly paid an operator $22.50, now $30 for an eight-hour day; pressman $12, now $15; ad man $18, now $22.50; make-up man $22.50, now $30, etc.

Any effort you make in behalf of the newspaper men will be mightily appreciated, and it is surely showing a splendid spirit when you do what you can in helping to make it possible for the country shop to continue operating. Much more of an increase and we will be forced to close.

Hoping you are enjoying the best of health and that you like the work of a Congressman, I am, awaiting your further demands,

Very sincerely,

H. M. STANTON.

WADENA PIONEER JOURNAL,
Wadena, Minn., May 11, 1917.

Hon. HAROLD KNUTSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: Prior to the war print paper cost me $2.45 plus freight from mills in Minnesota. The cost now is $6. I note it is proposed to put a 10 per cent tax on imports, and that will mean an additional advance of probably 50 cents. The difference to the Pioneer Journal in cost of print paper is that to-day is costs us $12.96 per week, as compared with $5.29 not more than one year ago, or a total loss to us of $398.84 yearly.

Labor is the next most serious item. My increase has averaged over 12 per cent, or about $800 annually.

Increase in heating is a serious matter. That amounts to $100 annually.

Increases in job stocks vary. It may be fairly stated that the minimum increase is about 25 per cent, while the maximum is 300 per cent. The average is about 50 per cent, in my judgment, and that means an increased cost of $750 annually.

There are other increases all along the line. Linotype metal is 14 cents to-day, as compared with 7½ before the war. All other metals have at least doubled. This of course affects prices of type. It would be impossible to give in detail all the facts until we have had a full year of business under existing conditions. It is conservative, however, to estimate that the actual increase in cost of producing the business of the Pioneer Journal to-day is $2,500, as compared with a year ago.

Of course, I have tried to meet this condition by increases of my own. However, the subscription price is still $1.50 as always.

My advertising rates were increased about 15 per cent last September, and to make it good I felt it necessary to abandon the flat rate and adopt the sliding scale. This made it necessary to contract the business. Therefore it is impossible to make any further increases of advertising rates until late next fall. And with regard to advertising, it may be interesting to know that the aggregate income from that source has shown little increase. In other words, we are getting better rates but using less space.

I have also increased my charges for job printing, perhaps 15 per cent, but the falling off has been noticeable. People are using less printed stationery. And in this connection it might be just as well to say something about Government competition in the envelope line. To-day the Government is selling a No. 5 envelope printed for $21.60 per thousand. This envelope would cost me $1.65 at the wholesale house in Minneapolis. A No. 8 envelope sells at the post office printed for $22.56 per thousand. The same envelope would cost me $3.80 per thousand in Minneapolis. Postmasters are instructed to and do solicit this business from local business men. The result is that the local printer is doing practically no business in envelopes. It would be fair to estimate that this has deprived me of the sale of 200,000 envelopes in the past year.

The inventory of the Pioneer Journal to-day is $11,000. Its total business in 1916 was $15,076.83, as compared with $15,109.09 for the year 1915.

Any new burdens for the business must be met by increased prices. This seems to mean decreased business for us, and that means less taxes for the Government. It may be added that local and State taxes this year will practically be double last year.

And there is an argument in this: If people quit using printed matter because of increasing prices, it must ultimately mean several things. It will mean less number of letters and parcels for the post office. It must mean a general decrease of business, for extensive advertising denotes business activity. If there is no market for lumber, because people have quit building, the lumberman simply figures that it is throwing away money to advertise. The dealer who advertises baby carriages at a discount in a community of bachelors would be considered a fool. And it is so with everything in the advertising line. If the advertiser has no market, he drops out until conditions change. Additional burdens on printing costs and on advertising means so many chains on business.

My personal opinion is that the newspapers would be glad to pay heavy taxes to help prosecute the war. They could do this without serious handicap if the Government would take vigorous action to prevent their exploitation by robber monopolies. Give us a decent-priced print paper, allowing the manufacturer a decent profit. Let the Government take control of the coal situation. That would save us much money. Soft coal to-day costs twice as much in Wadena as it did one year ago. This one robbery alone would almost pay the interest on the $7,000,000,000 loan. Let the Government look after some of the big thieves and the newspapers can take care of the rest.

Another point. The coal and iron people are patriots if they charge the Government a profit of 100 per cent, when they could get more money from European countries. Yet Congress demands that the newspaper donate advertising for war purposes. Why not demand donations from the other fellows? But, of course, the editor is patriotic enough to give his product. He needs no coercion, no act of Government.

Sincerely,

W. E. VERITY.

FARMERS, TEACHERS, AND WAGE EARNERS BACK PROPOSITION.

Powerful labor and farm organizations have also enthusiastically indorsed the plan of taxing incomes to pay the war debt promptly so that it will not fall on the poor or on future generations, who may have wars of their own to pay for. Prominent in the labor groups are the United Mine Workers of America, whose resolution, adopted at their recent convention in New York City, is as follows:

"Whereas the United States is at war with Germany; and

"Whereas immense war appropriations must be made immediately to supply the Government with funds necessary to carry on the war; and

"Whereas it is of paramount importance in this crisis that the financial burden of the war should be distributed among the citizens of the United States in accordance with their ability to bear it; and

"Whereas in the interest of national unity and a spirit of harmonious cooperation between all classes it is necessary that every citizen should know that the cost of the war will be paid promptly, and not remain as a future burden upon those who fought and their children: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That all bonds, certificates of indebtedness, and other obligations issued by the Government for war purposes shall be paid by a tax to be levied on all net incomes in excess of $2,000 (for unmarried persons) and in excess of $3,000 (for married persons), beginning at 2 per cent and increasing on a sliding scale to a point which will permit of no individual retaining an annual net income in excess of $100,000, such war tax to continue until said bonds, certificates of indebtedness, and other obligations issued for war purposes are paid; and be it further

"Resolved, That all war supplies or war services, including transportation shall be furnished to the Government at a reasonable profit, to be fixed by Congress; that Congress shall enact legislation preventing the sale of necessaries of life during the war at excessive profits; and that intentional failure to supply the Government with correct figures as to income or as to profits on such sales and service and that furnishing the Government with defective war supplies shall be a felony, punishable by imprisonment."

The Ancient Order of Gleaners has passed resolutions embodying the salient features of the pledge of the American Committee on War Finance.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, as we are to conscript men for the purposes of carrying on this war, I believe we should conscript wealth.

I believe if a man is to be taken from his home and family and sent to France to fill the trenches there that those men who stay at home should be called upon to pay liberally for the privilege of enjoying the liberties of a free Republic.

I am opposed to increasing the first-class mail matter postage at this time. We are told this will raise $70,000,000. I am opposed to the sales tax, so called, because I believe it places a tax upon the small manufacturer to the benefit of the large dealer. If we would increase the excess-profits tax by making it double what it is made in this bill it would raise about $200,000,000 more. [Applause].

But the thing that should be taxed the most is the large income. I believe that any man who has an income of over $100,000 should pay a very large part of it to help defray the expenses of this war. I believe that the excess of all incomes over $100,000 should be taxed to the extent of 50 per cent of such excess. I believe that the excess of all incomes over $500,000 should pay 75 per cent of such excess. [Applause.]

When we do this we are allowing any person with such an income sufficient for him to live on and pay all necessary expenses and lay up something each year.

Taxes should be placed where they are least felt. Instead of placing a tax upon the letters that are sent by relatives to each other and letters that are sent to promote the business of the country, place the tax upon excessive profits and upon excessive incomes, for no one can suffer thereby. A company must have the excess profits before they have to pay and the individual must have the excessive income before the tax reaches him. I would rather increase the tax on excessive profits and incomes, than lower the exemption.

I shall propose amendments when the bill is read making the increase in rates as I have indicated, and I believe that it would meet with the approval of the country, and surely no person affected could justly complain. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROSE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, from a personal standpoint I have always been opposed to war, and I had hoped that every morning's sun would bring us nearer and nearer to the enjoyment of a world peace. [Applause.] But all my hopes were shattered when the distinguished President of the United States, in a calm, dignified, scholarly, convincing manner told us that our rights had been invaded; that we were already at war with the German Imperial Government; and that the right is more precious than peace.

Let me say that shortly thereafter this House, by a large majority, indorsed that statement; and, following that, we declared that we were in a state of war. Following that we provided for a large sum of money, $7,000,000,000, to take care of this war; and, following that, we provided a method for raising an army to conduct this war. And following that again, we are now asked to provide money from the pockets of the people in order to conduct the war in which we are now engaged.

The only thing that annoys me is the fact that the people of the United States do not seem to know that we are in war, and we wonder why it is that there is no enthusiasm throughout the country following the declaration of war. I want to submit to you that in my judgment the cause of the failure to enthuse our people, to have them believe that we are in the throes and the agonies of war, is attributed to just exactly what we are doing now; that is, that we are dragging into our legislation so many things that ought not to be brought in at this time, and we are keeping information from the people which in all conscience should be given them. I have serious doubts whether, unless we are able to have the people know and comprehend the real situation, we shall be able to avoid the feeling of apathy now so prevalent. Our patriotism is not lacking, and our people are willing to do their bit, but something more is needed; but in the limited time allotted me I can not discuss that feature.

I want to address myself more particularly for a few moments to a feature of the present bill now being considered for the purpose of raising $1,800,000,000 by taxation.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. ROSE. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not believe that this new Official Bulletin, which is issued every day, is calculated to advise the people of what is going on in that connection?

Mr. ROSE. That may be; but where does it go? We know it, but nobody else knows it. I do not hear it talked about when I pass in and out among our people. It may be that this Government will do something in the near future to acquaint the people with the dangers now confronting us.

But let me come to the present bill. The first thing that attracts my attention is the fact that this measure lowers the income tax exemption to the sum of $1,000. The bill has been ably presented, and its passage advocated by the gentlemen of the Committee on Ways and Means, and I want to thank them for the candid and manly way in which they have presented it to us and given us all an opportunity to express our views regarding it. But I am particularly concerned because the exemption of incomes is lowered to the sum of $1,000.

Right there, gentlemen, I claim that we are not treating the laboring man as we should treat him. The great manufacturing community that I have the honor to represent is crowded with men of that stamp, and in my judgment it is an outrage that they should be obliged to pay an income tax upon the small sum of $1,000, when not a single man within the hearing of my voice is living upon that sum.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ROSE. May I have one minute more?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. ROSE. I would like to have that tax passed on to the men who are more able to pay it. I would like to see it taken away from the man who has not been treated properly at any time and whose wages have never been increased in keeping with the rapid rise in the price of foodstuffs and the necessaries of life. Whether or not we can take care of any particular newspapers and poster-advertising companies which believe they are being mistreated, and whose cause has been ably defended; whether or not we can take care of the makers of automobiles and musical instruments, for whom the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] so eloquently and forcibly pleaded, in God's name do not impose a tax upon the men who make it possible for you and me to live and who contribute so largely to the prosperity of the country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman already has that right.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to talk at any length, but I want to refer during the brief time that I shall say anything in regard to this measure to the last remark of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROSE], who has just spoken in complaint of the income tax. He misconceives the extent to which a man of moderate means has to pay under the income tax. There is an exemption of $1,000, which means a net exemption for a single person, and an exemption of $2,000 for a married person. Under this proposed law a single person would pay 2 per cent on his net income above $1,000. If his net income is $1,500, he would pay $10, or 2 per cent of $500. If $2,000, he would pay $20.

Under this law a married person or the head of a family with a net income of $3,000 would pay only $20. He pays upon the excess above $2,000. Is that a great injustice? Is that an enormous contribution to be paid by a single person or a married person when this country is involved in the greatest war in its history?

Many believe that the income tax proposed in this bill ought to take a larger percentage of the incomes of those who have large incomes throughout the country. I have always believed that while we took a large per cent of the great incomes, the small incomes, the comparatively small incomes, ought to contribute at least a small percentage. In my conception of government I have believed that all people, according to their means, ought to contribute in times of peace and in war a fair share of the burdens of the Government.

I submit herein a table, showing how this bill as amended will affect incomes in connection with existing law:

Income that will be collected upon specified incomes of married persons under the rates in the war-revenue bill as it passed the House.

Some people have complained of an inheritance tax. In this bill we have lowered the exemption from $50,000 to $25,000. A man who leaves a $50,000 estate to be distributed would have taken out of that estate $250 under this law. This is a small contribution—$1 out of $200—returned to the Government that has thrown its protecting arm around him during all the years while he has accumulated property and wealth. It has shielded and protected him in his lifetime and protected his property, and it is no injustice for the Government to take, on the distribution of his estate, this small contribution.

I have in mind an instance of one estate with which I was familiar, where the owner thereof was a prominent citizen, prominent in church and county affairs, who gave annually to the taxgatherer in the assessment of his estate his property as of the value of $4,000. After his death it was shown in the administration and in the inventory of his estate that he had $50,000 worth of good notes. Thousands like him have evaded taxation.

Now, $250 would be taken out of that estate under this bill as a contribution to the support of the Government. That is a small contribution from the estate of this distinguished citizen, who for many years had withheld from the taxgatherers the knowledge of the fact that he had concealed the larger portion of his estate from taxation, leaving the burden of taxation to be borne by others by not disclosing what property he had. Under this inheritance provision in this bill such estates pay this small contribution and larger estates increased amounts. There is one thing that this law would do—it would serve to uncover estates that have been unlawfully withheld from taxation.

Some States have passed appropriate legislation by which they can recover from such estates where they have beaten the taxgatherer in the past of taxes on property that they have withheld from taxation by concealment. In the few minutes allotted me at this time I can not even mention all the features of this bill.

The duty was devolved upon the Ways and Means Committee to bring in this revenue measure. They have done the best they could under the conditions. No single item in it perhaps meets with the judgment of all members of the committee. It is brought here to this House by the Ways and Means Committee, and the committee invites the criticism of every item in it, and it will take no exception if this House, whose duty it is to pass the measure and perfect it, shall see fit to amend it. They invite the House to better it if it can and if it will. Here in this House to-day and for several days this bill has been attacked by every interest affected. Every interest affected wants to avoid the tax and to thrust the burden upon others. By unanimous vote the other bill providing a bond issue was passed. Congress by an overwhelming vote has declared that we are in a state of war with the greatest military Government on earth, the greatest war in the history of the country or of the world. How are you going to carry on this war without money? The youth of the land are conscripted—your boy and mine—the principal and interest are offered as a sacrifice upon the altar of our country. Right or wrong, your boy and mine have gone, and every selfish interest in this country urges them to the front. The boys will bare their breasts to the destruction of life and health and are willing to give their all in defense of their country. You bid them go, and yet you come here to-day, you of the great automobile industry, and other special interests, and say let them go, but do not compel us to pay a single cent. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman five more minutes.

Mr. DICKINSON. I got a letter to-day from a good woman in my district urging me to use my best efforts to repeal the conscription law. Another letter I got from another good woman asking me to do what I can to reverse the action of Congress and stop this war. Nobody wants war, but we are in it. You can not fight this war without money. This great bill does not take the principal, in my judgment, of any concern involved in any section of this bill. The youth of the land may give their principal and their interest and their all. Oh, I have heard about taxes in my district and yours. You and I would rather our boys would come back safe and sound and we would be willing to pay, if we were able, every dollar of the tax in this bill, affecting our districts, rather than see our boys come back maimed or not at all. [Applause.] Your boy and mine go, and yet these men beg you to pare this bill and not take so large a per cent of their income and their profits.

I stand for the income tax—larger, if necessary. I stand for the excess profits tax. But if the excess profits tax on munitions in time of war comes at a time when the Government has normally increased the expenditure by reason of the conditions making large excess profits possible, shall not those who reap under this unfortunate condition help to pay, when increased appropriations are made necessary by these very conditions? I stand for a policy of a strong contribution from the great estates of this country, so that they can send their money with the boys to fight this war, which can not be successfully fought without men and without money.

Do you want to win the war? We are in it, right or wrong. Oh, this country can not afford to fail. To lose now in this great war, when it is at the height of its career, would blot the history of our country for all time. We must win, and we can win by the use of men and money. [Applause.] Where is there an interest in this country that is willing, with the approval of this country, to say "Tax the rest, but excuse us from our portion of the tax"?

I hope and believe that this measure, which I think has been a well-considered measure, will pass. You may take it and criticize it, but I hope it will pass the House with such amendments as the House may deem proper. I hope it will go to the Senate as speedily as possible, and that a revenue bill commensurate with the needs of this country will pass that body as soon as possible, and the country will then know that the Congress of the United States has responded to the demands and necessities of the country. If you fail to do it, you will be blamed by the people, who look to this body to do its duty and see to it that the United States of America shall stand firm and strong in war as in peace, and shall be triumphant in this greatest struggle in its history. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, we have been trying hard to understand the cost of second-rate mail matter. It has generally been made rather complicated, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] the other day doubted the reckoning with reference to railway rates. I do not know anything about railway rates. I do know something from seeing the carriers from my home post office day after day carrying mail bags full of newspapers, rather heavy mail bags, in sun or in snow from house to house, delivering them promptly the day after the paper was published, without the slightest mistake, and I have sometimes wondered whether the United States could deliver those papers for a cent a pound. I thought I would inquire what it costs to deliver them by a much cheaper way, namely, by a boy. I have found that in this city of Washington a boy gets $3 a month for delivering the daily Star in the afternoon. He takes out 50 copies of the paper. I have just weighed one of those papers of 12 pages and find that it weighs 3½ ounces. Fifty copies weigh almost exactly 10 pounds—16½ ounces for every five papers—and he gets just about 10 cents a day, or 1 cent a pound.

Again, I am informed that for the delivery of the morning Post, which also has a Sunday paper, they pay the boys $2 a week. The boys go earlier and have a longer trip and carry more papers. Six of the daily Posts for six days would weigh 21 ounces. The Sunday paper weighs fully 11 ounces more, making 2 pounds for the paper for a week. The boy, if he carries 100 papers, carries in a week 200 pounds for $2, or again a cent a pound.

This is underpaid labor, not such wages as we pay to our men in the Post Office who get their thousand dollars a year, and who have to deliver a special paper to a special address instead of any paper of the same class to a line of addresses, who have to ring the bell and hand it in at the door instead of throwing it up to the door, and who have to sort out the papers beforehand in the post office so as to get those addressed to their routes in order. It is worth a good deal more than a cent a pound to deliver in this way, and I am therefore forced to the conclusion that the additional rate of a cent a pound in the first zone is less than the Government has to pay now for the delivery, which has never been counted, as far as I can find out, in making up the Post Office cost.

Will it be paid and how? They say it can not be passed on. I have files here of the New York daily papers and read their prices. The New York Tribune sells for 1 cent a copy in New York City. The daily Tribune costs by mail for a month of 27 days 50 cents, and if the Sunday paper is also sent it costs 75 cents. The New York World sells for 1 cent in Greater New York and 2 cents outside of Greater New York. The American sells for 1 cent in New York City and 2 cents in outlying towns and elsewhere. The Sun sells for 1 cent in Greater New York and sells elsewhere for 2 cents. The Herald sells for 1 cent in Greater New York and 2 cents in suburbs and Rockaway districts and 3 cents on trains and elsewhere. The subscription prices all allow for postage. If postage costs more, the newspapers will get it back someway, and if they have to send their papers down to Washington by special train and sell them here they will charge more. I pay 3 cents for the Tribune every day I purchase it, at the cheapest place, and up to 5 cents in the hotels. Mr. Chairman, taxes will be placed upon the consumer. The newspapers will not fail because of this. It is hard to pay taxes, but it is wrong for the Government to pay other people's expenses without return. I am simply stating it as a matter of justice. Mr. Chairman, have I any more time remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time is just exhausted.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I just wanted to add, for our country's sake let us pass this bill without delay and show that we are in earnest in this war. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN].

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, in his address before the House yesterday the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] endeavored to justify the present revenue bill submitted by the Ways and Means Committee, of which he is a member. Not once but many times he emphasized, in dealing with a particular portion of the bill, that "this was wrong" or "the principle was wrong" or "the theory was wrong." I do not know how many "wrongs" he emphasized during his address, but at the conclusion he informed the House that taxation must be based on justice. It was perplexing to me to follow his logic, which seemed to be a multiplication of wrongs, in his desire to arrive at a conclusion of justice. He naturally aggravated in my mind the question of how many wrongs it takes to make a right.

There is no question but that the honorable members of the Ways and Means Committee have worked hard in their endeavor to give us a bill that would produce the immense revenue essential to prosecuting the war. To my mind, however, they seem to have lost sight of the principle that, although war demands universal sacrifice, this sacrifice should be equitably apportioned.

The committee contends that their object has been to divide the burden as equally as possible, but have they done this? They have not. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] was quite sure that progress had been made toward equalizing the burden from the fact that, whereas last year some 332,000 individuals paid an income tax, that under this bill, if it becomes a law, the number would be increased to some 4,000,000. The fact is decidedly illuminating. With the exemption lowered to $1,000, the committee finds that only 4,000,000 individuals will pay an income tax. Evidently there are 96,000,000 people in this country whose earnings are, on an average, from nothing up to $1,000 per year.

According to the census of 1910, there were 38,167,000 persons of 10 years and upward engaged in gainful occupations. Of this number about 12,000,000 were engaged in agricultural pursuits. Taking an average from the increase from 1900 to 1910 and applying it, it would, to be liberal, give us in 1917, 45,000,000 engaged in gainful occupations. These people constitute the backbone of our country's welfare. They are staggering under the tremendous problem of trying to meet the present high cost of living on an income of less than $1,000 per year.

War conditions and war prices have forced the average American into a financial position where he can not decently live on his meager income. According to the New York Times Annalist of April 23, 1917, the 25 most common and necessary articles of family use have almost doubled in price in the last two years. According to Dun's index figures, we find that the prices of foodstuffs have increased 105 per cent between April 1, 1914, and April 1, 1917.

A short time ago the Old Dutch Market, incorporated in Washington, D. C., operating a large number of stores selling foodstuffs, published a comparison of prices from April, 1914, and April, 1917. This comparison deals with 60 table necessaries. The average increase on all items considered for that period was 85.3 per cent.

According to the United States Bureau of Labor statistics for April, 1917, flour increased in price 69 per cent for the four years from February 15, 1913, to February 15, 1917; eggs increased in price 61 per cent; potatoes, 224 per cent.

On February 15, 1914, a 16-ounce loaf of bread cost 5½ cents. That bread to-day costs 10 cents per loaf. On April 26 of the present year a food committee was appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Says the committee—

> Interesting figures were obtained from the proprietors of some of the smaller stores, whose business is with the poorer people. They show clearly that the poor have been compelled to resort to the strictest economy in order to provide food, on account of the high prices. Their purchases are of the cheapest possible articles, and in smaller quantities than heretofore. The sale of ordinary cuts of meat in this class of stores seems to have been discontinued, and the meat now purchased consists of hog's livers, hog's kidneys, neck bones, hog's faces—

And so forth. The price of hog's faces to-day, I believe, is 15 cents per pound.

Wages, of course, have advanced sharply since the war began, in some instances in a spectacular manner. But, according to the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, during the four years from 1912 to 1916, in the large field of union labor, there has been a rise of only 9 points. Index figures for 1917 are not now available, but if we were to grant that during the first four months of 1917 wages increased as much as during the whole period from 1912 to 1916, which, of course, would be an extravagant claim, still we would only have an increase of 18 per cent from 1912 to 1917.

During the last three years, according to Dun's report, foodstuffs have risen from 46 to 105 per cent. If we take the figures of the Times Annalist, the cost of the food budget for the average American family shows an increase of 74 per cent in the last two years.

Facing the facts that we know are bitterly true as regards the poor people, who are reduced to the necessity of doing without ordinary cuts of meat and subsisting on hog's livers, neck bones, and hog's faces, is there a man in this Congress who wants to stand for a revenue measure that in the outworking will pass on to these people further burdens in the way of taxation? To my mind the Members of this House can not by any subterfuge of specious reasoning justify a course which will mean additional hardship to the already hard lot of the poorer classes.

Briefly, I have shown the actual conditions, bitter in the sacrifice involved, that confront the average wage earner in America to-day—an average increase of wages liberally construed of 18 per cent, as against official figures of an increase in foodstuffs averaging from 46 to 105 per cent.

Now, let us consider the condition of the corporations. According to the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, pages 26 and 27, we find in the ratings of 190,911 corporations, big and little, an aggregate net income as of June 30, 1916, of $5,184,442,389. This is an increase of 43 per cent or $2,229,120,000 over the net income of 1915. This 43 per cent increase in the net earnings of all corporations is a bagatelle compared with the larger companies. Taking 24 of the principal corporations and comparing their earnings in 1914 and 1916 we find a net increase of 500 per cent. These enormous net increases will undoubtedly continue.

According to the United States Steel Corporation's last quarter's earnings, which is published, we find that of the percentages maintained for the whole year the net amount applicable to dividends for 1917 would be about $450,000,000, as against net earnings of 1914 amounting to $23,496,769.

Some of these corporations have been liberal toward the Government, such as copper and steel, by offering to the Government their products at a greatly reduced cost, figures which in themselves show the tremendous earnings in the past of these companies. They will still have tremendous earnings, for the many corporations that are furnishing our allies with materials are not conducting their enterprises from the standpoint of philanthropy.

Where then shall we place the burden of taxation? Is it not a part of common sense and statesmanship—which is simply common sense applied to our political affairs—is it not the part of common sense to place the burden where it can be most easily borne? The terrible demands of the war must be met, and if necessity requires it, even the pittance of the poor would have to be taken in spite of the sacrifice involved, but no such necessity now confronts the Nation. Yet, according to the provision of this bill, several hundred millions of dollars will be taken from the pitiful purse of the poor. Every dollar thus extracted will mean robbing children of decent nourishment and decrease their mental as well as physical stamina. This is not necessary, and it would be a tragedy if such a method should be followed. The Government needs eighteen hundred millions of dollars revenue and they should get it and can easily secure it by taxation of incomes, excess profits, inheritances, etc.

The income taxes should be increased almost double. According to the present bill Members of this House who are married, with a salary of $7,500 per year, will pay an income tax of $225, and yet we voted to conscript young men to go to the firing line, with the possibility that hundreds of thousands of them will never return, while our burden is to be $225. Would you men object to paying double that amount, or $450, out of your income, and all other incomes in proportion, rather than extract from the meager earnings of the poor? It seems to me that we should all be glad to pay that increase in the way of an income tax. We should be, at least. And if we are willing to do it ourselves let us have the courage to compel others to do it in like proportions.

The British Government collected by tax, during the 12 months ending March 31, nearly $2,600,000,000, which was eighteen hundred millions more than was collected in the last year preceding the war. This additional taxation did not affect the business of the country unfavorably. It did not penalize business enterprises, and it did not weaken motives for thrift. The standard of life of no class in the community was seriously lowered. Consumption of comforts and luxuries were materially reduced, but this was an advantage, setting free labor and capital for war purposes. The evident justice of heavy taxes upon those whose incomes have risen since the beginning of the war had that invaluable psychological effect of stimulating the British people to devoted exertion in every field of economic activity.

The backbone of the British system of taxation is the income tax. According to Prof. Sprague, the lowest rate of income tax is 11¼ per cent on earned incomes under $2,500. They are wise enough to give an exemption of $125 for each child. We should do that in this country, or even more. We could easily raise $1,000,000,000 of the amount of revenue necessary in this bill by heavily-graded income taxes, without a single person affected thereby being compelled to suffer any great sacrifice.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. If the gentleman will give me more time.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will give the gentleman one minute. The gentleman says that he can raise a billion dollars by income taxes. We will raise a billion and thirty million dollars on incomes.

Mr. LUNN. This bill raises $532,000,000 on incomes and then $108,000,000 by putting your hand back into last year's incomes.

Mr. FORDNEY. On income taxes the gentleman said it raises——

Mr. LUNN. And then $200,000,000 on excess profits.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, no; it raises $1,300,000,000 on incomes.

Mr. LUNN. Read it; it is right there.

Mr. FORDNEY. I have read it a dozen times.

Mr. LUNN. So have I.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman has not read it or he would know that it raises $1,030,000,000.

Mr. LUNN. Will the gentleman deny that it is $532,000,000 in the report?

Mr. FORDNEY. I repeat that from income taxes there will be raised $1,030,000,000.

Mr. LUNN. We have it right here in your own report. That should be conclusive.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am not talking about the bill, but I am talking about income taxes. There are other laws that raise income taxes besides this proposed law.

Mr. LUNN. I am talking concerning this bill, and the gentleman is talking about taxes that have been or are to be paid additionally on incomes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am talking about the income tax.

Mr. LUNN. Collected in 1910?

Mr. FORDNEY. It does not make any difference.

Mr. LUNN. How far back does the gentleman go?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, nonsense.

Mr. LUNN. The gentleman is talking about an income tax in addition to the amount provided in this bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is not what the gentleman said at all.

Mr. LUNN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Here is the printed report and here are the exact figures. You are getting $532,000,000 by income tax and $108,000,000 on the 1916 retroactive tax. That is what you are getting.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman is wrong.

Mr. LUNN. The other principal method of revenue is by a tax on excess profits. I believe that much of the opposition to excess-profits taxes would be overcome if we would impose it on a more scientific basis. These taxes are imposed in nearly all the belligerent countries. The principle should be to secure for the Nation a part of those profits, which, in general language, are "definitely due to the war." The English excess-profits tax in November, 1915, was 50 per cent and raised to 60 per cent in April, 1916. This was "imposed on all profits in excess of the average profits of each business during two of the last three years preceding the war, the taxpayer being permitted to select the two years, which are to serve as a basis. This tax has proved unexpectedly remunerative, yielding a revenue of nearly $700,000,000 during the last 12 months. It has not crippled industry. The business community generally has recognized that it is a proper war-revenue measure. For the current year the rate of the taxes has been advanced from 60 to 80 per cent." In this connection let me quote a short editorial from the New Republic of May 12:

> The adoption of the English method of computing the excess-profits tax will not only yield a larger revenue without discouraging and alarming ordinary business, but it will prevent the building up of a strong vested interest in the prolongation of war. The copper companies and steel companies are earning so much money over the statutory 8 per cent that they could pay to the Government 12 or 16 per cent of this excess without feeling it. They will still be accumulating surpluses which, unless the war stops soon, will enable them to accumulate almost a dollar in cash for every dollar in previous capitalization, and they will have made these accumulations not because they earned it by any new economic service, but because they earned it by controlling basic raw materials which were being destroyed in huge quantities, and for which, consequently, there was an artificially large demand. It is this kind of profiteering which is both demoralizing and intolerable, which, if it is allowed to continue, will make American participation in the war look like a capitalist conspiracy, and which will create dangerous and lasting public resentment. The most effective way to disarm the popular suspicion which attributes all making of war to the machinations of those who profit from selling war supplies is to prevent such profits from benefiting private individuals.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield the gentleman a minute. The gentleman and myself seem to misunderstand each other.

Mr. LUNN. I am sure we do.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman spoke about the income tax. This law and the existing law raises $1,030,000,000 from an income tax.

Mr. LUNN. Yes. I admit that; that is revenue raised in other bills during this year.

Mr. FORDNEY. This bill and existing law—there are one or two other bills—but there is no man taxed, even a single man, more than $20 on $2,000 of income.

Mr. LUNN. Do you make any exemption for children?

Mr. FORDNEY A married man has a $2,000 exemption and pays $20 on $3,000.

Mr. LUNN. Does the gentleman make exemption for children?

Mr. FORDNEY. Children are not taxed except through their parents.

Mr. LUNN. They are taxed; you take it out of your bill by not giving them exemption. You penalize a man for raising a family.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman believe $20 on a $2,000 income is going to send any man to the poorhouse?

Mr. LUNN. I do not think so.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is what this bill does. That is the maximum tax on $2,000—$20.

Mr. LUNN. Does not the gentleman think, as a matter of principle, exemption for children should be recognized? Our British friends make an exemption of $125 for every child.

Mr. FORDNEY. Wait a minute, my friend. The British income tax is an entirely different tax from our tax. England raises a heavy tax by incomes. They have no state, county, or city taxes as we have in this country.

Mr. LUNN. I am well aware of that fact.

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman understand that there are no exemptions for the wife in England, and here we make it one thousand for a single man and two thousand for a married man?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LUNN. Will the gentleman yield me two minutes?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I believe that we could well afford to spend sufficient time on this war-revenue measure to make it a measure that will lend encouragement to the war without proving disastrous either to the poorer people or to the business interests of the Nation. Better go slow and be right in principle than speedily pass a measure which can not be justified on the basis of any scientific principle of equitable taxation. Let us pass a measure so just in its provisions that every citizen of America will feel a new spirit of devotion to their country and consecrate themselves with renewed energies to the prosecution of the mighty task involved in this great war. Injustice never creates enthusiasm. We need enthusiasm among the working people, and it is a hopeless task to stir enthusiasm while the stomach cries. We need enthusiasm among our business men, and they can not grow enthusiastic if their legitimate business is unfairly dealt with. We need publicity to the farthest corners of the country, and we are not going to get it with an unjust tax on periodicals. The bill as drawn will create a monster monopoly of public information. But, Mr. Chairman, more than all, we need an enthusiasm that fires the heart among those boys who are to take up the responsibility of national defense. When these boys who are still in training desire for recreation to smoke a pipe or a cigar or go to a movie or a baseball game, we do not want their enthusiasm to be cooled by facing a war tax. Neither do we want these boys, the great mass of whom are from the working people, to have any reason to believe that while they are willing to lay down their lives for the country, their loved ones at home are suffering unnecessarily by unjust taxation.

Deeply do I feel that the suggestions I have outlined as a method of securing revenue are just and equitable and therefore right. It is best for labor, it is best for business, it is best for all classes in this great country. It will create a new spirit for America—a new spirit of devotion, a new spirit of patriotism—and God knows we need a renaissance of spiritual motive as a driving force in our great endeavor. We have conscripted men, let us have the courage to conscript the dollar. If we do this the great mass of business men of the Nation will put forth a new effort to produce and prosper; the toiling masses will take on new hope and rejoice that a new day has come in this land.

The people of the Nation, one and all, will be inspired with the thought that a new freedom has come to America. They will bear their burdens and make their sacrifices with the conviction that the strong and the weak are not bearing equal burdens, but equitable burdens. They will look up to their flag with a new affection, convinced that its mighty folds serve as a canopy under which a mighty people has, with patriotic devotion, determined that democracy shall not die, and that liberty with justice shall prevail, and that the government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall never perish from off the earth. [Applause.]
